But the administration has insisted on making this fight and so those of us interested in reducing the deficit and truly promoting saving and investment have no choice but to support the Democratic leadership alternative—the Rostenkowski-Gephardt amendment.

On every test that should be applied to this vote, the capital gains provision fails and the leadership amendment passes.

First, the deficit test. The capital gains provision does not provide permanent deficit reduction. Indeed, it ultimately increases budget deficits and the national debt. The capital gains cut raises revenue only temporarily through a cynical 2-year manipulation of the tax rate. According to the Joint Committee on Taxation, the proposal loses revenue steadily after 1993.

The leadership amendment produces long-term deficit reduction rather than a long-term deficit increase. This graph compares the two proposals and clearly shows the difference. Compared to current law, the capital gains provision increases the deficit by $21 billion over the next 10 years. The leadership proposal decreases the deficit by $64 billion, resulting in a difference of $85 billion between the two plans.

A capital gains tax cut hurts rather than improves the Nation's future, because the resulting revenue loss forces the Government to borrow and use up far more private savings than can be stimulated by the tax cut. This leaves the Nation further short and further behind our historic savings rate, our needs for the future, and our international competitors. It is time to reject the delusion that more revenues can be raised by cutting taxes.

With the capital gains provision, the budget reconciliation bill as a whole does not achieve substantial permanent deficit reduction. This is simply not what reconciliation was meant to do, nor what this year's bipartisan budget agreement and budget resolution were intended to do. While they fell short of a bold package, at least they were intended to produce permanent deficit reduction. The leadership amendment restores this. It increases the deficit reduction in reconciliation by $25 billion over 5 years.

Next is the fairness test. The leadership amendment gets rid of the unfair bubble rates in the current law. The marginal tax rate on the wealthy is now 28 percent, but for the upper-middle class, it is 33 percent. The leadership amendment says that the superrich should be treated no better by the Tax Code than those less well off. There is no reason why the middle class should be more heavily taxed, relative to the rich, for making investments or earning a higher salary, as is true under current law.

The leadership amendment applies the same 33 percent marginal tax rate to the ordinary income of the wealthy as to that of the middle class. It also applies the same maximum rate of 28 percent to the capital gains of the middle class as to the rich.

Unlike the capital gains provision, which is a temporary quick-fix that will force a future tax increase to replace lost revenue, this proposal is fair and straightforward. Unlike the capital gains tax cut that is skewed toward the rich, the leadership amendment responds in a responsible and fair way to the concerns Members and the American people have about savings.

The vast majority of the capital gains cuts to the wealthy in our society, a direct reversal of one of the critical compromises on the Tax Reform Act of 1986. According to the Joint Committee on taxation, 70 percent of tax relief from a 30-percent capital gains exclusion will go to taxpayers with incomes of $100,000 or more, the richest 16 percent among all who benefit. At a time when there is a growing gap between the incomes of the rich and poor, how can we even consider enacting a tax break for the rich that increases budget deficits?

Instead, the leadership amendment restores 50 percent deductions for individual retirement accounts, responsibly pays for the tax benefit by eliminating the current bubble tax structure, and delivers the benefits to the middle class not just the rich.

Finally, there is the test of how each proposal affects the Nation's economic future. The economy is not going to be improved by an ill-advised capital gains tax cut. It does not make economic sense to increase deficits. It does not make sense to move money around from less tax-favored investments to more tax-favored investments, reviving the inefficiencies that the Congress tried to discourage with tax reform. It does not make sense to encourage corporate takeovers. It does not make sense to encourage corporate takeovers. It does not make sense to squander revenue by adding to the profits on investments that have already been made. It does not make sense to create a 27-month fire sale that encourages the wealthy to shift their investments around for the greatest tax advantage—not make the kind of new, long-term investments that can benefit the economy.

It does make sense, however, to reduce the deficit and expand our national saving, which is what the Rostenkowski-Gephardt amendment does.

For those of my colleagues that vote for this proposal, do not come back tomorrow and ask, "Where are the funds for education? Where are the funds for housing? Where are the funds for defense? Where are the funds for economic disasters? Where are the funds for all of these priorities we care about?" Mr. Chairman, they will have already been spent on this tax cut.

In 30 days we are going to have to vote to increase the debt ceiling in this country to $3.1 trillion. That is the legacy, the legacy of trickle-down economics. The false promise that somehow by cutting taxes we can balance the budget.

Are we really going to repeat that lesson again?

The choice is clear. Continue the legacy of the last 8 years, or vote to reverse it.

Vote for Rostenkowski.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. VANDER JAGT].

Mr. VANDER JAGT. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the winds of political controversy are blowing hard on the House of Representatives today. There is a poem that goes something like this:

One ship sails east, and another west, with the self-same winds that blow/
'Tis the set of the sail, and not the gale, that determines which way you go.

The vote that we cast in just a few moments on the tax increase amendment will tell the world and your districts the set of your sails and which way you want to go to obtain more revenue, the way of economic growth and expansion or the way of higher taxes. Setting sail over the banner of higher taxes I think represents a change in game plan for the Democratic majority. I had thought that in the wake of Walter Mondale the idea was to distance congressional Democrats as much as possible from the tax and tax label, and the Democrat leadership insisted that the budget summit agreement contain this sentence: "Legislatively revenue will proceed legislatively only when supported by the President of the United States."

I do not blame you for that. You did not want to get out on a tax increase limb without the President there with you. Well, this tax increase amendment, which is all we are going to be voting on, changes that game plan and it sure rips up the summit agreement, paragraph 11.

But what mystifies me is why in the world is there this irresistible impluse to vote for higher taxes when a rate reduction provides us with the revenue necessary to meet the reconciliation targets?

It all began when Ways and Means needed $2.8 billion in additional revenue in order to pay for the worthwhile tax benefits we added to the package. The solution seemed almost too good to be true. By lowering the capital gains rates for 2 years, people would be induced to sell their assets, pay a tax on the gain, rather than sit on their assets and pay no tax whatever. That produced $2.9 billion, and the most beautiful part was that almost two-thirds of all the additional tax revenue would be paid by wealthy individuals. It is a way of soaking the rich to pay for the tax benefits that we had extended to struggling students and working mothers; but there is just one little problem to a tax and tax liberal. A taxpayer is also a tax beneficiary, and even though there are three beneficiaries earning under $50,000 for every beneficiary over $50,000 in the Jenkins-Archer capital gains reduction, the drafters of this tax increase amendment said;

We would rather deny relief to the small business man, to the farmer, to the senior citizens who worked and saved a lifetime for a nest egg and didn't want government to tax away the gain as they try to enjoy the fruits of their labors, we would rather deny any relief to those people than give any kind of benefit to a successful achiever and producer.

The class warfare would not permit the relief to that middle-income and lower-income bulk of the American population that would be receiving the benefit, and thus history is ignored.

A little over 8 years ago I stood here and pleaded with my colleagues to vote for the 25-percent rate reduction across the board for every American, rich and poor alike, and that was to stimulate the sagging economy that had been left behind by Jimmy Carter. Democrats joined with Republicans to launch that economic expansion, which now in its 82d month is the longest, strongest, most sustained economic expansion by any country in the history of the world; 20 million additional jobs added and black unemployment at the teenage level at the lowest level in the history of our country as that economic expansion provided jobs and opportunity for all Americans.

And you know what? The rich are paying dramatically more total dollars in taxes and a bigger percentage of the tax pie than before the cut in rates, and that trend continued in the tax reform of 1986, when under the vision, the courage and the leadership of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI] tax benefits were sacrificed to drive those rates down to 15 percent and a top rate of 28 percent, and economic expansion continued, jobs were created and the rich paid a still greater percentage of the total tax pie.

The Ways and Means tables tell us that 2 years of capital gains reductions continue that same trend, with the rich paying more total dollars in taxes and a bigger percentage of the total tax pie.

We, to be consistent with tax reform, should continue in that reduction of reducing the rates to provide incentives, but no matter what you think of capital gains reduction, for heaven sakes, do not vote yes on this tax increase that is the opposite of tax reform and the unraveling, putting back into the Tax Code tax benefits of timber and IRA's and then raising the taxes and adding a higher tax bracket in order to pay for it. That is the unraveling surely of tax reform.

As our Ways and Means Committee chairman told us in the Ways and Means Committee, when you start down that slippery slope, there is no stopping, and we have to constantly raise the rates on more and more people to pay for the benefits we put into the Tax Code.

Surely, surely we want to continue in the direction that we have been traveling of stimulating the economy, to expand it so lower rates produce even more revenue from an expanding economy, rather than a tax increase which would take $35 billion out of the private sector in the next few years, so that we would then have to tax more and more people higher and higher rates to produce the same amount of tax revenue from a shrinking economy.

Let us continue to set our sail in the direction that we have been traveling for 8 years that has been so successful of initiative to expand the economy and create greater jobs and opportunity for all Americans. To vote for this tax increase when the revenue is not necessary to meet reconciliation is to announce to your constituents, in the paraphrased words of Irving Berlin:

You can count on it. I will be taxing you always. Not just for this day, not just for a year, but I will be taxing you always, forever more and more and higher and higher.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. JENKINS] is recognized for 6 minutes.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, in listening to this debate today, I do not think there is any institution or organization that uses or needs the first amendment more than this institution, because every possible statement has been made here today from both sides, not much of it totally accurate. We really need the benefits of the first amendment, and I hope our successors will forever defend it for the benefit of this institution.

Now, I want to talk for a few moments about capital gains. I want to say this to those people who have always opposed capital gains on principle. I have never asked you to change. You do not believe in it, and I respect you for your views.

For those on this side of the aisle who do believe in capital gains including the six people on the Committee on Ways and Means who voted for it on the Democratic side, I pay tribute to you, because you have withstood all the pressure there is, all the party wrangling, everything in the world, but you stood by your principles without asking for a single thing, you other five, and to those Democrats today who are going to vote for this because they believe in it, because it is good for their district, because they believe it is good for America, I tip my hat to you, but to those others who say, "Well, I am for a little bit of capital gains but I do not like this plan; I am for indexing, but I am not going to take this plan; I am for all of these other things, but it is the wrong time, the wrong place," my friends, this is the only vote you are going to get. You have to decide whether you are for capital gains or you are against it. If you want to improve it, if you wanted to eliminate the 2-year window, if you wanted to make capital gains permanent, if you wanted to just leave indexing, why is it not being offered on the House floor today? You draft the rules, our leadership does. We could substitute, if that is what the majority of us want, indexing, and have it for the future. But you do not have that opportunity, do you? No, you do not.

You have the opportunity because we have polled the people. We live by polls today. We have polled the people, and we think we have found something not even related to capital gains that will be popular today. Are we going to govern by polls?

The IRA is popular. Of course, it is, but it has nothing to do with capital gains and capital formation and cost of capital. It is apples and oranges. It means absolutely nothing.

If you are going to offer something in the field of capital gains, do it. Let us vote on it. If this is a bad proposal, let us have a vote up or down and eliminate this proposal in its entirety if it is bad or place your substitute for us to vote upon. That seems fair to me. But we shall not have that opportunity.

I hear that we are going to have a deficit trust fund out of the $80 billion in the next 10 years, and I am not saying that tax is all bad. It is against the higher income that the alternative has come up with. When we look at my budget chairman's chart, he shows that there is some $75 billion or $80 billion difference in the next 10 years between the two plans. Of course there is. Because there are $75 billion or $80 billion in increased taxes over the next 10 years. Why did you not take that and make indexing or permanent tax, capital gains, cut, or whatever you want in the field of capital formation? That seems logical to me. That seems to be the direction that we ought to go.

I challenge my leadership to explain to us why we do not have a vote on indexing, why we do not have a vote on permanent capital gains reduction if the 2-year thing is bad. They need to explain to all us. No, I am for reduced rates in capital gains because I believe in it, because I believe it is good for this Nation, and I believe it is good for the Democratic Party.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FLAKE].

Mr. FLAKE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Rostenkowski amendment.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. CARPER].

Mr. CARPER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Rostenkowski-Gephardt amendment.

When the smoke has cleared and the rhetoric has cooled, we may be surprised to find that there's actually a good deal that most of us here can agree upon within these two competing alternatives.

For example, indexing productive assets, acquired in the future and held for multiyear periods of time, against inflationary increases in their value makes sense, as does capping the capital gains rate at 28 percent.

Similarly, encouraging families to increase savings through expanded IRA participation makes sense.

And, it makes sense to pay for these changes, as well as to reducing our budget deficits, by asking people earning over $200,000 per year to pay the same marginal tax rates as families earning $75,000.

In a few minutes, this debate in this Chamber will end, but in reality this process is still in its early stages. My hope is that most of us in the Congress and in the Bush administration now will begin to focus on those areas in this debate where we can and do agree. If we do so, I believe there is ample time, and more than ample reason, to craft a compromise which encourages capital formation and savings, is arguably fair to taxpayers and is fiscally sound, as well.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6½ minutes, the remainder of my time, to the majority leader, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT].

Mr. MFUME. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEPHARDT. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MFUME. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Rostenkowski-Gephardt Democratic alternative to the capital gains tax-cut. This vote is very critical to this Congress and the American people. The choice between the two proposals is very clear, we can either give a tax break giveaway to the rich, or we could support the backbone of our Nation's economy, the middle class.

We have heard all of the arguments in favor of the rich getting this tax break, and we are all aware that President Bush has expended an inordinate amount of time and energy attempting to convince our Democratic colleagues and the voting public that a cut in capital gains is necessary for increased national revenues. Well, now it is time for the voices of the American people to be heard. Their message is the message of the Democratic Party. And our one voice shall be heard through the support and passage of the Democratic alternative.

The plan that the administration is pushing, 80 percent of the tax giveaway would go to those making in excess of $100,000. This group represents a mere 3 out of every 100 taxpayers. On the other hand, the Rostenkowski-Gephardt plan benefits millions of hard-working American families who make considerably less by providing them with the means to be able to buy their first home, send their son or daughter to college and save their hard-earned money for other American dreams.

A key component of the Democratic alternative is the expansion of the individual retirement account. Under the proposed IRA expansion, families and individuals who presently are not allowed a deduction for amounts placed in an IRA, will be permitted to deduct 50 percent of their contributions. This would inevitably make IRA savings available for use by families seeking to buy their first home or send their children to college. Additionally, the Democratic alternative eliminates the "bubble loophole" of the present income tax structure by which the tax-rate on the very highest incomes is really less than the tax-rate for lower income persons. When the rich get richer, and the poor get poorer, and we can do something about this inequity, then it is time to act. Now is that time and the action is to vote for the Democratic alternative.

Mr. Chairman, it is long past time that the middle class started benefiting from their hard work. The Democratic alternative will reduce the deficit, run up by the Republicans over the past 8 years, while generating needed money for pressing domestic problems.

I urge all of my colleagues to accept the alternative for the sake of the great majority of hard-working Americans.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Chairman, I first want to give a bouquet to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means who has brought a major part of this bill to the floor. There has been a lot of second-guessing about what he did or how he did it on this issue or that in the last few days. I simply want to thank the chairman for the work that he has done in a very difficult circumstance. I do not think many people understand the difficulty of the issues that the committee has dealt with, and I think his leadership has been remarkable.

Mr. Chairman, what we have today is not a choice between people, not a choice between parties, and not a choice between personalities. What we face today in the House of Representatives is a choice between two different visions of what it will take to make our country strong. First, we have a choice about what kind of tax policy we will follow in the days ahead.

Back in 1986 there was a bipartisan agreement about tax reform. It was historic. A Republican President and a Democratic Congress came together and built, as the gentleman from Michigan said, the most important historic change in tax laws we have ever had in the history of the country. It was difficult to achieve. We had a conference on that bill, and there were two different visions of how to do tax reform, and a compromise was reached. As always in this country, it was difficult to do. Democrats on our side and from the House had a vision of what it should be and gave up individual retirement accounts, which we wanted to have in the final bill. We gave up a progressive rate system so that people earning $150,000 or more had a lower rate than people earning less than that, and in return for that, we got something that tax reformers have advocated and fought over for 50 years, which was to have the tax on capital gains to be the same as the rate on ordinary income, and now before the ink on the bill is barely dry, the President comes back to the American people and says, "Let us break the deal. Let us have the rate on capital gains again be lower."

What was a historic compromise is now jeopardized if this proposal which is in the committee bill passes, because we all know what comes next. Next the people who want the investment tax credit will be on this floor wanting to bring that back in, and then it will be the passive loss provisions, and they will come back in.

And before we know what has happened, we will be back at a top rate of 50 percent, or 60 percent, or 70 percent to accommodate the erosion of the tax base which is represented by this change which is suggested today.

So we have two visions of what kind of a tax policy we want in this country, and this is the decision on tax policy that Members will have to make. Do Members want to go backward or do they want to go forward?

Second, we have a decision about what kind of savings and investment policy we will have. Most economists, both conservative and liberal today say that our greatest need is to increase savings for the long term. Investment in the future is what we need.

Members have two very different visions to choose from today on that very important issue. If they choose the plan that the chairman and I have proposed, they will be saying that they want to give about $350 a year to about 5 million families in the country, many of them middle-income and lower income families to save for education, to save for housing, to save for retirement, and it is an incentive to save in the future, not for something they did in the past.

If Members vote for the committee version, they will be voting to give $25,000 a year on the average to the 375,000 American families, the wealthiest families in America for some decisions and investments that they have already made, not for something that they might decide to do in the future.

I do not have to explain why I think ours is the better vision.

Finally, Members have to ask what vision they want with regard to where our country shall go, with regard to its own public savings, with regard to its own fiscal situation, and this chart tells the entire story. How much longer are we going to put ourselves in a position where we are borrowing billions of dollars a day, a week, a month, a year from foreign investors?

I do not know why my colleagues came here. I am sure I know why I came here, and I did not come here to be a trustee in bankruptcy. But each of you knows in your heart and your mind that is what has happened.

I was in Japan in November and I had a meeting with the Keidanren, which is like their business round table. At the end of the meeting one of their top people said:

Congresmen, we have a suggestion. Our investors are now lending 40 percent of your debt. They are getting worried about the stability of your economy. If they pull out of your money markets, they will destroy our country because your interest rates will go from 12 to 20 in a day, so we have a respectful suggestion.

He said:

We are asking that you denominate your U.S. Treasury securities in yen instead of dollars.

How much longer will we go on? How long will we postpone the fiscal decisions that we all know we have to make?

If Members vote for the committee bill, if they vote against the alternative, they will be voting to increase that deficit, increase that borrowing, increase the dependence that we have on foreign countries, and be eroding the strength of our country.

So today we make a decision about our future. That is what this vote is about, and I am here in the well today asking, pleading with Members to make that decision based on what in their heart and mind is the best for the future of this country. Do not listen when some contributor, a well-meaning contributor may call and say please vote for capital gains, it helps my own situation. I know the temptation to do that. But do not give into it, and do not give into a threat that there will be a TV ad coming in the fall that will say: "You voted to raise taxes."

Do not be cowed by political messages. Stand up for what you think in your heart and your mind you know is right for your country and your future. This is the chance for the right vision for America. Let us stand up for it.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 190, noes 239, not voting 3, as follows:

NOT VOTING—3

Florio	Garcia	Yatron

□ 1224

Mr. MARLENEE and Mr. MARTINEZ changed their vote from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MAVROULES, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 3299) to provide for reconciliation pursuant to section 5 of the concurrent resolution on the budget for the fiscal year 1990, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Hallen, one of its clerks announced that the Senate had passed with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, bills and a resolution of the House of the following titles:

H.R. 2088. An act to revise and extend the programs established in the Tempory Child Care for Handicapped Children and Crisis Nurseries Act of 1986;

H.R. 3015. An act making appropriations for the Department of Transportation and related agencies for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1990, and for other purposes; and

H.J. Res. 407. Joint resolution making continuing appropriations for the fiscal year 1990, and for other purposes.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON H.R. 2990, DEPARTMENTS OF LABOR, HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES, AND EDUCATION, AND RELATED AGENCIES APPROPRIATIONS ACT, 1990

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 2990) making appropriations for the Departments of Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education, and related agencies, for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1990, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. CONTE

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to instruct conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CONTE moves that the managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill, H.R. 2990, be instructed to insist on the House position concerning Low Income Home Energy Assistance.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE] will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. NATCHER] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, there is one key issue our subcommittee must deal with that I believe deserves the special attention of our conferees.

That issue is the Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program.

Over the years, LIHEAP funding has been whacked and whacked again to the point where the whole program is on the verge of crashing down and hurting millions of needy people. Since fiscal year 1985, LIHEAP funding has been cut by a third.

Almost 2 million people have been dropped from the rolls, including young mothers and their children. Entire families have been forced out of their homes because they could not pay their heating or cooling bills. That is why I am proposing that the House go on record in support of the House position of $1.4 billion. I say it's time to fight back and restore funding for this very worthy program.

I was heartened to see that 57 Members of the Senate and 234 Members of this body signed a letter of support for LIHEAP, calling for $1.44 billion, the current services level. The House mark of $1.4 billion is already below that level and the Senate mark is $121 million below us.

It's clear that the support for energy assistance in both Houses is broad and deep. Some Senators worked hard to bring LIHEAP to a reasonable level where we can make some significant progress in the conference. Unfortunately, they failed to come up all the way to the House position, although my friends, Senator HARKIN and Senator SPECTER, expressed their strong support for the program in conference. I will be looking forward to working with them to bring LIHEAP up to the House level. In the meantime, the House and the 234 Members who signed the letter can make their preference clear by voting for this motion.

As we swing into action on this bill, I would like to point out some important issues for our Members to consider.

One argument I heard was that, once again, oil overcharge money is available to the States to help pay for energy assistance. Well, that money is no longer available and the administration no longer claims that overcharge funds are sufficient to make up for future cuts.

Some are saying that we have to cut LIHEAP because energy prices were supposedly stable and the need for the program has somehow evaporated. Nothing could be further from reality.

This coming winter the Department of Energy is predicting that fuel oil and natural gas prices will rise significantly over last year. Meanwhile, needy families are still paying 14 percent or more of their income on heating, four times the percentage paid by middle and high income families. With energy costs rising, the low-income families are again facing their own budgetary crunch.

High energy costs put the needy at risk of losing their homes and their livelihoods. I think it is outrageous to see people forced out of their homes because they could not pay their heating or cooling bills. We end up paying more for emergency health and housing costs. LIHEAP is good, strong preventive medicine against homelessness and illness.

The social safety net is getting tattered, torn and frayed. Year after year the budget cutters have ripped so much fiber out of the net—the holes are now so big you could drive an oil tanker through them. Entire families are falling through the net and we are paying the price, a painful price, for not maintaining energy assistance at a decent amount.

Now is the time to repair the safety net. Now is the time to vote to hold LIHEAP at the House level.

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONTE. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE], my friend, knows, ordinarily I am against the instruction of conferees.

Under the circumstances now existing this request is very much in order, and, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts be accepted.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER].

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE], my colleague, for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I want to advise the membership that at the conclusion of the debate on this motion I will ask the body to defeat the previous question, and my purpose in doing that will be in order that I might be permitted to offer a motion to instruct conferees on this HHS appropriations bill that I think expresses an issue that in this country today needs to be addressed by those of us in a policy making body on specifically what we teach our children in the schoolrooms of America.

Mr. Speaker, we all know that the Federal Government is deeply involved in assisting education in the public schools of America through appropriations in this HHS appropriations bill, and Senator HUMPHREY, our colleague on the Senate side, was successful last year in getting an amendment into the appropriations bill that none of the funds could be used for the purpose of advancing homosexuality as a normal lifestyle or normal practice. Unfortunately, that restriction that was adopted by a vote, I think of 82 to 15, last year in the Senate was cut out in conference. Senator HUMPHREY was successful in getting this restrictive language in this appropriation bill this year, and I think it is appropriate that we also addressed the issue in this House.

For example, in my State of California, in the Los Angeles school district, one of the largest in the country, they have embarked on a program called Project Ten. The rationale for this program is to say to the children in that school district in America that homosexuality is a normal thing, that it is a practice which should be tolerated and condoned in our society.

Mr. Speaker, I want to make clear to my colleagues that what two men, or two women, or a man and a woman do in the privacy of their domicile is none of my business and none of the Government's business, but when the proponents of this alternative lifestyle come into the public square of debate and seek through the political process to use taxpayers' money to subsidize a perversion that most Americans consider to be abnormal, I think they have got the attention of this Member of Congress, and they should have the attention of any person serving in a State legislature around this country or serving in the Congress of the United States.

We today in this Nation are witnessing one of the most brutal frontal attacks on traditional family values for the assertion of this alternative lifestyle. Our friends on the Democratic side have embraced this movement totally. They have amended the bylaws of the national Democratic Party so that there is antidiscrimination statutes in those bylaws for all members of the Democratic Party. The national Democratic Party has directed every State Democratic Party in America to have an affirmative action program for every committee and subcommittee of the State Democratic Party.

Totally the Democratic Party has been taken over by this movement. I hope that the Republican Party in this country does not succumb to that same temptation for the crass appeal to votes.

There is an element, a political constituency, out there that seeks approval, and I do not think we should be tolerating it, and this is the reason that I will ask to defeat the previous question, so that I will have an opportunity of offering this motion to instruct.

Mr. NAGLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. NAGLE. Mr. Speaker, what group has taken over my party and me?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. NAGLE] would care to take a look at the bylaws of the Democratic Party, he will find on reading them that they do exactly what I have said.

I say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. NAGLE]:

> Your party has adopted amendments to its bylaws in the decades of the eighties which say very clearly there's antidiscrimination against homosexuals, and every State Democratic Party in America is directed by the bylaws of the national Democratic Party to have an affirmative action program for homosexuals in every committee and subcommittee.

Mr. NAGLE. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER] saying that the Democratic Party has been taken over by homosexuality? I just do not understand.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. No, Mr. Speaker, I think it is the other way around. I think the national Democratic Party has looked to this political movement on the part of homosexual activists and welcomed them into their tent. In effect they have said:

> It's O.K. You're one of us. We're going to work to achieve the political objective of changing the culture of America so that we will accept and equate homosexuality on par with a heterosexual lifestyle.

Mr. Speaker, that is what this bill is all about.

Mr. NAGLE. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER] will yield further, I think the gentleman does himself no honor in attacking members of my party with those types of spurious allegations.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, let me observe to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. NAGLE], my friend, that actions have consequences. When the national Democratic Party has done what I have described, and it is factually correct, the consequences of that political action must be accepted by all.

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I join with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE] in his request, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to instruct.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

Mr. SMITH of Texas changed his vote from "no" to "aye."

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, due to official business I was unavoidably absent on September 28 for rollcall No. 254, motion to instruct conferees on H.R. 2990, and rollcall No. 255, motion to instruct conferees on the Labor-HHS appropriations bill. Had I been here, I would have cast the following votes: "aye" and "aye."

MEETING OF RULES COMMITTEE SCHEDULED TO CONSIDER A RULE PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF LEGISLATION ON ARMS CONTROL

(Mr. MOAKLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to inform Members of the House that the Committee on Rules has received a request from the Chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs that a rule be granted for the consideration of a bill authorizing appropriations for the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency.

This bipartisan request is for an open rule with the restriction that only amendments be in order which are printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on or before Wednesday, October 4, 1989.

Mr. Speaker, the Rules Committee will schedule a meeting to consider a rule on this bill for next Tuesday, October 3d. While it is impossible to say with certainty what type of rule the Committee will grant, I wish to advise members that—in light of the bipartisan request for a rule with a printing requirement—they have their amendments prepared and printed in the RECORD on or before Wednesday, October 4, 1989.

The bill has been introduced in the House today and will be available in printed form by tomorrow so that Members may have their amendments properly drafted. In addition, Chairman FASCELL will have the bill printed in today's RECORD so that it will be available to Members in that form on tomorrow.

I thank the Members for their attention and their cooperation.

CONTINUING APPROPRIATIONS, 1990

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 407) making continuing appropriations for the fiscal year 1990, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Senate amendment: Page 8, after line 2, insert:

SEC. 107. For necessary expenses in carrying out the functions of the Robert T. Stafford Disaster Relief and Emergency Assistance Act (42 U.S.C. 5121 et seq.), an additional $1,108,000,000 for fiscal year 1989, to remain available until expended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HERTEL). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will not object, but I do wish to permit the chairman of the committee and other Members to clarify what we are doing here.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONTE. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, this is the same continuing resolution that was adopted on Tuesday with one amendment—a $1,108 million fiscal year 1989 supplemental for disaster relief. The supplemental will permit the Federal Emergency Management Agency to provide disaster assistance to those States and territories ravaged by Hurricane Hugo last week.

Mr. Speaker, may I advise the House that the Senate adopted this continuing resolution by a vote of 100 to 0.

Mr. Speaker, the House has passed all 13 bills.

The Senate has now passed 11 bills. The energy and water is awaiting signature of the President.

The resolution goes through October 25.

The resolution provides three rates: For bills passed by the House—House or current rate, whichever is lower, with terms and conditions in effect in fiscal year 1989; for bills passed by House and Senate—House or Senate rate, whichever is lower, with terms and conditions in effect in fiscal year 1989; and for energy and water—the conference rate.

Each bill comes out from under the continuing resolution upon the regular Appropriations Act becoming law.

Mr. Speaker, during House consideration of House Joint Resolution 407 on Tuesday, I laid out the record of the Committee and the House in moving appropriations bills. It is found on page H5911 of the RECORD of Tuesday. I will not restate that, but I do recommend that it be read again.

Mr. TALLON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONTE. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TALLON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the ranking minority member for yielding to me, and I also wish to express my deep appreciation to the Chairman of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. Speaker, when we in South Carolina stumbled out of our shelters and basements last Friday we saw a world that had been brutally shattered by Hurricane Hugo.

By approving this $1.2 billion in emergency funding Congress is giving South Carolina's people and communities the glue we need to begin the long, slow process of putting our world back together. And we are grateful.

This money will be allocated to the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) and will better enable FEMA to provide immediate relief to those individuals and communities crippled by the hurricane.

In South Carolina, we've got a half million people displaced, a quarter of million out of work and damage to physical property exceeding $4 billion. That's not taking into account the effect on agriculture, tourism, and daily increases in clean up costs.

Even today much of our State does not have power, communications, or even adequate food and shelter. There's not a person in my congressional district that hasn't been touched by this disaster.

This storm hit us head on and now we've got to hit back. With this funding, people in South Carolina who have suffered hurricane-related damage to their homes and businesses can get help rebuilding and coping and local governments can begin repairing roads, bridges, and other damaged public facilities.

To me, this is what government should be about. Reaching out and helping people who need it desperately.

I have heard it said that it is the set of the sails and not the gales which tells us the way to go. I appreciate my fellow Members for setting the sails in the right direction.

Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, continuing my reservation of objection, I yield to my good friend, the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, we are pleased, of course, that the Senate added the $1,108 million for the disaster. This is for the Caribbean area, South Carolina, and North Carolina.

I would say that on the basis of the preliminary information that is available to us, the probabilities are that this sum will not be adequate. Let me say that again. This sum will not be adequate when the total bills are presented.

That means that at some point in the future we will hear again from Hugo, and this time it will not be in terms of wind but, rather, in terms of the clank of additional dollars.

What I am interested in most specifically is to first advise the Membership that these kinds of sums, both what we are looking at in this continuing resolution, the $1 billion-plus, and the additional billion or two that may be necessary when the final check is presented for Hugo, cannot be handled inside the budget allocation for the VA-HUD-Independent Agencies Subcommittee, either for 1990 or for 1991.

Having made that statement and appreciating the fact that this section 107 is a supplemental for 1989, therefore, my information is that it is not scored against the committee in terms of the 1990 bill. So this is outside the scoring process.

I am pleased to see that a very distinguished member of the Budget Committee is here, and I refer to our good friend, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL]. What I would like to extract from the Budget Committee, while Hugo is still fresh in our minds and while we are all concerned about the human tragedy of that hurricane, is some further information and discussion and promise from the members of the Budget Committee that the next appropriations for Hugo will be treated in a similar fashion. This subcommittee cannot deal with an additional $1 billion or $2 billion being tacked on to either the 1991 or 1992 bill. We are going to have to rely upon the compassion and the understanding of the Members when we are counting the beans, totaling it up, and what we want more than anything else is an understanding, not in relationship to this amount, because it is taken care of and it is not going to be scored against us, although it will add to the deficit and it will show up across the board later on, but in terms of the understanding that there will be more coming.

So, Mr. Speaker, we are going to need the help of the Members at that time, and I anxiously await the good comments of my colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONTE. I yield to the gentleman from New York, the ranking minority member of the subcommittee.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished ranking member of the full committee for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to join in the remarks of our distinguished chairman of the subcommittee. I think it is extremely difficult to estimate what the final cost to FEMA will be in dealing with this great tragedy.

When I was regional administrator of HUD in the years 1970 to 1977, I was involved in the aftermath of two very similar kinds of events. Eloise which struck Puerto Rico in the mid-1970's, and Agnes, which a few years earlier had hit Pennsylvania and the southern tier of New York State. I know from my experience there that it is extremely difficult at this point, so far removed from the storm to have any realistic evaluation of what this will ultimately cost FEMA in terms of its responsibility.

For the sake of those Members who may not be as familiar as our subcommittee is with the FEMA programs, let me say that they provide both emergency assistance to the people who have been left homeless and without shelter by the disaster, and they are required under law to provide at least 75 percent of the funding for repair or replacement of State or local government buildings which have been damaged or destroyed by the disaster.

Again, we really do not have any idea at this point of what that will amount to. It will be a very large amount.

I would like to make one other observation on the budget process which I think this situation that we are facing today makes much in point. I have on a couple of occasions urged the Budget Committee to establish as part of the budget process some contingency account so that we are not left with trying to have to deal with one gimmick or another toward the end of the year with crises of this sort. There are always contingencies coming along at the end of the fiscal year that were not anticipated a year or a year and a half earlier when the budget resolution was adopted.

Last year it was the drought and the tremendous difficulties that brought to the agricultural community. We have had the drug program. Now we have this great disaster that has to be dealt with, and I think it is just foolish each year to start on course with a budget resolution which does not anticipate the reality that there are always going to be unexpected moneys to appropriate and expend, and the budget process ought to have some process of dealing with those rather than these kinds of jerrybuild structures we put together at the end of the process in order to accommodate something we know in one form or another is always going to be with us.

So, Mr. Speaker, I am happy to support the continuing resolution. With this amendment from the Senate it is the first, and I hope the largest, part of the money that we will need to deal with this disaster.

However, Mr. Speaker, I think for the future that we should certainly try to run our budget operation in a way that these events, though singly unanticipated, that they will occur, should be anticipated, that those events are dealt with and we can deal with them in an orderly way from a budget point of view rather than the way we are doing it today.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I want to point out that at the time I was chairman of the Committee on Small Business in 1977, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE] was the ranking member, and we established in the Small Business Administration a revolving fund which worked very well for low-interest loans to businesses so they could get started again, to the local communities so they could become whole again, to the home owners and others at a low-interest loan. That program has worked very well. We have a cadre of people who move in right away after the disaster and take care of those kinds of problems.

Mr. Speaker, that revolving fund is now getting very, very low because over the past 6 or 8 years there has not been support for that approach. But that is still the best approach.

I say to my colleagues, "If you have a low-interest loan and can move in right away to help these people, as they pay it back it keeps the revolving fund going," and that is the best approach, but we are going to run out of money. We may not have enough money in the revolving fund just for this major thing.

Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to be prepared for that.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I yield to my good friend, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL].

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, there have been a couple of comments made, one by the distinguished gentleman from Michigan, as to how we are going to score this matter. For the purpose of the continuing resolution, it has been thrown in as a 1989 item so that it does not disrupt the allocations of the gentleman from Michigan.

However, most of that money is going to be spent; that is, converted to outlay in 1990, and, therefore, it is ultimately going to require some kind of special treatment under Gramm-Rudman. One kind of special treatment would be a waiver of Gramm-Rudman. No one likes that precedent, but this is a genuine emergency.

All of this, I think, relates back to the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GREEN] which says, "Why don't we set aside some money against these emergencies?" That, I believe, is not the function of the Committee on the Budget. It is the function of the appropriators who know that these emergencies occur every year.

In the gentleman from Michigan's budget, he has less than $200 million for FEMA. My colleagues know that FEMA could not fight a bonfire with $171 million, much less take on real emergencies.

Mr. Speaker, the fact is that those of us in the House have a lot of programs we like, and so we wedge out of our poor, abused appropriations all of the money they have available for these wonderful programs. We leave nothing for emergencies, and now we are stuck with a real problem.

The only reason I did not object to this amendment in the first place is because we have an obvious emergency, and we have to take care of it. Nobody in his or her right mind is going to tell the people of the affected area that we are not going to help them right away.

Mr. Speaker, this is another example of the chickens coming home to roost and we are not prepared to deal with it. We have not made the proper setasides in the past to take care of it, and something is going to hurt. Usually the first purple-hearted victim is the U.S. taxpayer.

Either we are going to have to punch a hole in Gramm-Rudman and set a precedent that will haunt us forever, or we are going to be crazy bookkeepers, another bad precedent, or we are going to let Gramm-Rudman bite and let it affect other programs we do not want it to affect, or we can do the right thing in the future by cutting back on discretionary programs and setting up some kind of a revolving pot.

Certainly, however, this is a perfect example of our own past unwillingness to set aside necessary amounts of money for emergencies we knew were going to occur.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA].

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, as you know, this temporary continuing resolution provides for very restrictive rates of funding, and is therefore tens of billions below the amount allocated to the Appropriations Committee. The continuing resolution also contains about $1 billion in disaster assistance, to be used by the Federal Emergency Management Administration—FEMA—to help communities devastated by Hurricane Hugo. The administration supports this funding, and has estimated that at least this much, and very probably more, will be needed. I support this disaster assistance funding and commend the committee for moving so rapidly to meet this urgent need.

A question has been raised about this disaster funding and the 302(b) allocation for appropriation subcommittees. While the full amount of the continuing resolution is below the total allocation to the Appropriations Committee, the VA–HUD Subcommittee is above its allocation of discretionary budget authority, but solely because of the disaster assistance funding. As you know, House enforcement of 302 allocations is based upon the amount of discretionary budget authority in an appropriation bill. (Likewise, the caps set on budget summit agreements are based on discretionary budget authority.) Therefore, a point of order lies against this bill because of the disaster assistance money. I support waiving that point of order—by unanimous consent or by granting a rule.

Both the administration and the Senate also support waiving the budget allocations to allow this essential disaster assistance funding to go forward. The Senate has achieved this end by reclassifying this funding as "mandatory" so that it would not count against the discretionary caps. In my view, that is the wrong way to proceed. We should not make unilateral, ad hoc changes in scorekeeping classifications and rules. We should not change the rules in the middle of the session. We should not misclassify a budget account by pretending that discretionary funding is mandatory. For that reason, the House Budget Committee will continue to score this funding as discretionary; this is legally correct, conforms to 14 years of precedent, and conforms to the budget summit agreement of last spring. Of course, as I have already said, I will support all necessary waivers.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TRAXLER].

Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Speaker, I think the comment on the part of the chairman is correct, and I think earlier in a private conversation with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] he also indicated that a waiver would have been a correct approach. I regret the Senate did not take that approach. It is clear that they did not want to vote on that kind of an approach for obvious reasons on their side, but it would have been much cleaner and much neater.

I hope if this issue comes back before us in the coming months that it will be more carefully addressed on that side of the Capitol.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the motion to agree to the Senate amendment to House Joint Resolution 407.

Mr. Speaker, the Senate has once again done the unexpected. This time they did the sensible thing.

They passed the clean, short-term, noncontroversial continuing resolution that we passed Tuesday with only one change. They added a sweetener of $1.1 billion as a 1989 supplemental for the costs of cleaning up from Hurricane Hugo in Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and North and South Carolina.

I support that action, I know many of my constituents are extremely concerned with what has happened, particularly in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, and I want to do everything I can to make sure those areas get the assistance they need in the shortest time possible.

Mr. Speaker, this seems too good to be true, but fiscal year 1990 may come and go on midnight Saturday without anyone even noticing. The lights illuminating the Washington Monument can keep on shining. The wheels of government can keep on turning. The Social Security checks can keep on securing. And the block grants can keep on blocking.

If this motion passes, we will have averted an emergency by more than 48 hours. The American democracy will not come to a grinding halt. What happened to the cataclysm, the thunder and lightning, the seven horsemen of the apocalypse?

Have we lost our flair for the dramatic? Is there no longer a fascination with looking into the abyss?

Mr. Speaker, a continuing resolution, is never a good thing, but it is a necesary thing.

The wheels of progress on appropriations are turning a little slower than they should. We need a little more time to finish our work. But I remind the Members that our wheels, slow as they may be, are spinning a whole lot faster than the other big wheels around here.

Any time the Senate keeps a clean bill clean, and a simple bill simple, we ought to take it and run.

I want to wish all of my colleagues, and all members of the Federal family a happy fiscal new year.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HERTEL). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the consideration of the Senate amendment to House Joint Resolution 407.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON H.R. 3012, MILITARY CONSTRUCTION APPROPRIATION, 1990

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 3012) making appropriations for military construction for the Department of Defense for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1990, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

MOTION TO INSTRUCT OFFERED BY MR. CONTE

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to instruct.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CONTE moves that the Managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses on the bill H.R. 3012, be instructed to insist on the House position on Senate Amendment number 29 with regard to the Base Closure and Realignment Accounts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker. This is a motion to instruct the conferees to the Senate amendment No. 29 with regard to the base closure and realignments accounts. We have voted on this, and I hope the House will accept it.

Mr. Speaker, I am always disheartened to propose measures which affected other Members unfavorably. Base closing has been a torment for most of those whose bases have been recommended for closure by the law we passed last July.

Tuesday of this week, the other body voted 86 to 14 to turn back an amendment to have the GAO determine whether or not a base should be closed.

It is my belief that the action of the other body, once and for all, affirms the unflinching, uncompromising support for the Base Closing Program.

Be that as it may, the base closing and realignment account is in the Defense appropriations bill in the other body. That account is in the Milcon appropriations bill on our side. It seems to me, that the execution of base closing and realignment is most appropriate in the Milcon bill.

The $500 million requested for this year, as well as the $500 million for next year which goes into the base closing account, is primarily for new construction for realignment. As we begin to implement the Base Closing Program, providing for the smooth close out of installations, movement of troops, and integration of units and functions will be uppermost concerns. We should put those Members who are most familiar with the housing stocks and facilities on our bases in control of overseeing the implementation.

In addition we need to have a unified effort in the Congress to make this all happen more efficiently.

Mr. Speaker, I think the Milcon Subcommittee is the group that should do this job. We should go on record supporting them as they meet in conference on this issue. I believe that we can enhance our position on this issue if we instruct our conferees to hold that position.

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, we have no problem.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HEFNER] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE] may rest assured that we have no problems with this, and we are going to pursue the House position and see that we pursue it with all vigor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to instruct offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE].

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HERTEL). Without objection, the Chair appoints the following conferees:

Mr. HEFNER;
Mr. ALEXANDER;
Mr. THOMAS of Georgia;
Mr. COLEMAN of Texas;
Mr. BEVILL;
Mr. DICKS;
Mr. DIXON;
Mr. FAZIO;
Mr. WHITTEN;
Mr. LOWERY of California;
Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma;
Mr. KOLBE;
Mr. DELAY; and
Mr. CONTE.

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the consideration of the conference report on the bill (H.R. 3014) making appropriations for the legislative branch for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1990, and for other purposes, and that I may include extraneous and tabular material.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 3014, LEGISLATIVE BRANCH APPROPRIATIONS ACT 1990

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 3014) making appropriations for the legislative branch for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1990, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, the conference report is considered as having been read.

(For conference report and statement, see proceedings of the House of September 25, 1989)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO] will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from California [Mr. LEWIS] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO].

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, we are bringing to the floor the conference agreement on the Legislative Branch Appropriations Act for 1990. The House and Senate conferees have reached an agreement on 41 amendments of the Senate to the House bill. That agreement provides for about $50 million short of $2 billion in new budget authority for Congress and other agencies of the legislative branch for the upcoming fiscal year to begin October 1.

In reaching our agreement with the Senate, we met and even surpassed our budget ceiling goals. We are $48 million below our budget authority ceiling and right at our outlay ceiling as well.

Except for the Senate items and the Government Printing Office, the agreement is either below the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings base lines, or below the amounts provided in the current fiscal year. I intend to insert in the RECORD a tabulation of the conference agreement.

There were several amendments that related to the Library of Congress, the Government Printing Office, the operations of the Senate, and various other activities in the legislative branch. These differences were all resolved and none of them, I believe, are controversial. That leaves, however, the mail issue, which has become highly controversial.

I think that is unfortunate, because we did come out of this conference with significant reforms on mass mailings, but we did preserve at the same time our ability to communicate effectively with our constituents. I would like briefly to describe the mail agreement to my colleagues.

We have agreed to reduce postal patron newsletters from six to three a session, a 50-percent reduction. We have exempted town meeting notices for Member appearances, however, from that, making clear, however, that we do not believe it is appropriate to exempt notices for Senate staff to appear in lieu of a Senator.

We have allowed the Senate, however, to continue their office account loophole, giving them additional opportunity to mail when they reach limits on this general appropriation.

We will limit mass mailings to two sheets of paper, four sides. There will be no abuses in that area. Apparently there were allegations that Members were sending overly large bulk mail.

We have agreed to tighten up the 60-day before election rule by using a postmark criterion that augments the work that the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS] led us to do on the House floor on the issue of passage of this bill by the House.

All of these changes caused the Postal Service to estimate that we could save up to $40 million on our appropriation for next year as the result of the changes made in conference.

We have also reduced the appropriation and set up separate accounts to accommodate our Senate colleagues. In fact, this year we are reducing by some 26 percent the Postal Service estimate for fiscal year 1990 mail. We have split the account between the House and the Senate, allowing the House $54.6 million, which is actually almost 10 percent below this year's amount, and at the same time allowed the Senate almost $30 million, which is, I might add, 16 percent above this year's amount, giving the Senate conferees, I believe, a well won victory on this significant issue, at least significant to our Senate colleagues.

Most importantly, perhaps, for future fiscal prudency, we have adopted procedures that will allow us to control spending on the Postal Service franking privilege when it begins to be evident that we have an inclination to go beyond our limit. The Postal Service will provide quarterly statistics on House and Senate mail volumes and costs. After the second quarter of the year, if the Postal Service projects shortfall in funding, the Senate Rules Committee and the House Franking Commission and the House Administration Committee will be advised and are authorized to issue regulations to bring congressional franking spending under control.

We also have provided, and we may hear more about this later, a fiscal year 1989 supplemental to make up for the $31.7 million shortfall which has occurred in the current fiscal year for 1989.

It is my opinion that we should never fail to pay our bills. This should be considered a mandatory payment, one that I hope all of us will agree we should make at the earliest opportunity.

I will go on to say, however, that we did not accept the Wilson amendment. I believe that amendment was a straw man. It was not well drafted. It would have put us over our budget ceilings and the Senate would have been able to ignore entirely the amendment by utilizing their own rules and statutory loopholes to take care of problems that relate specifically to the Senate and not to the House.

I think it is important that we consider the flawed Wilson amendment from three standpoints; first of all, the procedure. It is highly unlikely that if Members of the other body had been alert, the Wilson amendment would have been offered in the first place, because it was out of order under Senate rules. It was offered and adopted, I think, because of the emotional content of crack babies, which brings us to the second point. We all understand the dilemma that pregnant women who are hooked on drugs face and certainly the dilemma that faces children born to them. That emotional fact, I think, carried the day in the Senate.

I want to report that we have made a great deal of progress in meeting this real national need. Currently I can tell my colleagues that there will be at least $40 million provided to deal with this problem of prevention and treatment of pregnant women and their high-risk babies, women and children who are addicted to drugs.

There was at the time of the consideration of the bill on the House floor $15 million which had been allocated for this problem area, and subsequently as a result of the agreement between the Senate Democrats and President Bush, the so-called Byrd amendment, an additional $25 million has been made available for pregnant women and infants. As a result of an amendment that was agreed to last night on the Senate floor, agreed to by such individuals as Senators KENNEDY, WILSON, HATCH, BIDEN, and KOHL, we may well find an additional sum will be appropriated. Certainly a higher figure has been authorized.

So for those who are concerned about dealing with crack babies, we have seen both before and subsequent to the vote here on the House floor attention given to this problem.

Third and last, I would like to concentrate for a moment, however, on the question of equity between the two bodies. Under the Wilson amendment, Senators would have a loophole. They would be allowed to charge their Senate contingency fund for nonfranked mass mailings. The Senate would be in a position, for example, to charge its office account when the Senate ran short of its overall appropriation for franking purposes. Senators would be able to resort to personal funds and to campaign funds. Many Members are not aware of that because campaign funds have been prohibited in the House since the late 1970's, but Senators can commingle campaign funds and their legitimate expenses as Members of the Senate. Senate offices can be supplemented by paid employees who are paid out of campaign funds. Senators can drive automobiles on so-called official duties, paid for out of campaign funds, and Senators are certainly in a position to supplement their franking needs using postage meters or other forms of postage to avoid a prohibition on the use of franked mail.

I think it is important that we operate honestly and above board in this area. I think it would have been particularly destructive had we continued to develop the additional levels of cynicism about this institution if we had agreed to an amendment that would not have accomplished its upfront purpose. There were several methods of bypassing the Wilson prohibition, and I think it is important that we not agree to this amendment for that reason alone.

Some Members of the House would be surprised, perhaps, to know that the House mail budget was reduced by some 40 percent by that amendment, while the Senate budget was reduced by only 6 percent.

I think many Members of the House would be surprised to know that, unlike the way we operate, the Senate subsidizes their mailing programs by causing the printing expenses to be allocated to the budget of the Sergeant at Arms, and the purchase of paper costs to be allocated to the Government Printing Office.

We did not have a level playing field, and I think it was particularly important that the House reject that amendment and move on to other reforms that can be rationally agreed to and which really go to the essence of the criticism that we have been hearing from some quarters.

With respect to the Wilson amendment, the elimination of "unsolicited" mass mailings are unfair to the American public who need information from Congress on catastrophic, budget deficit, changes in retirement, health care, legislative agenda. It would be unfair to Congressmen whose only opportunity to acquire public opinion is by using questionnaires or surveys. It would be unfair to House Members because, while WILSON says no more frank for mass mailings, the Senate created a loophole in their own financing to use their office accounts and campaign funds for metered mass mailings. There are many ways to get around the mass mailing ban, for example, generate "planted" general solicitation from interest groups; many 499 volume mailings; many more costly first-class addressed mailings; and so forth. Thus, the Wilson ban could lead to more expensive mailings, or methods to avoid which would yield public and media resentment and cynicism.

To recap the spirit of WILSON is achieved by reforms agreed to by conferees: Reduced newsletters, tightened 60-day rule, Postal Service tabulations, elimination of staff meeting notices, and projected overrruns will be referred to appropriate Senate committee or House committee or the Franking Commission.

The Wilson amendment would have been a bad deal for the House and a bad deal for the American public.

We have newsletter reform. We reduced the appropriation significantly. And we have instituted controls. We have a good and responsible compromise.

Mr. Speaker, the agreement worked out with the Senate conferees is a fair one and one that I believe can be supported by all Members.

I ask for an aye vote on the conference report.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, before discussing the bill before us, I would ask my colleagues to focus for just a moment upon a related but not exactly on-target consideration as we address this measure. From time to time, the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS] and I spend a little time together in another room in this building, and there frequently we have occasion to spend some casual time with my chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO]. I wanted to mention to the body, as we are considering this measure, that it is appropriate that once in a while we step back and take a direct look at colleagues who are of special service to this House. My chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO], like very few among us, spends a lot of his energy and time not just in that room where the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS] and I are, but, rather, in the House serving its membership.

This bill is not a simple bill. It is a difficult one in part because the House loves to beat itself on the chest individually and collectively as to how tough we can be on our own budget, this legislative branch bill contains items which are of interest to the membership. Few in this House make the contribution that the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO] does to all of those efforts, and so at the beginning of these comments, both the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS] and I wanted to come together and express our support and appreciation for the work of our chairman.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, let us hear it for the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO]. He does not get those pictures in the Washington Post easily, friends.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that this is not an easy bill. The report that is before us, coming from the conference committee, is not perfect by any matter or means, and with it, I am not entirely satisfied. My chairman did refer to what is now being called the Wilson amendment, and I had hoped that our final product would have been closer to the direction that the Wilson amendment would have taken us.

Essentially Senator WILSON from California raised the reality on his side that within this bill we do spend an awful lot of the taxpayers' money essentially tooting our own forms. We spend a lot of mail money sending missiles to our individual districts that are designed more than anything to build our own name identification, and it was the Senator's point that maybe we ought to recognize that reality, and that within this bill, as well as many others, we can afford to look at cutting back to see if we cannot meet other major challenges that are before us. He highlighted the tragic problem of crack babies and suggested that if we eliminate unsolicited junk mail we would reallocate the savings—some $45 million—to help with the problem of crack babies. Indeed, we would be making a significant contribution to that very critical problem.

Our citizens have figured out that these mass mailings are primarily designed to drive up name-identification. The valuable public services that newsletters could provide—by detailing the legislative process, setting forth public-policy challenges, or sketching compelling world trends—are usually ignored in the bipartisan quest for more photos, more political calling cards, and more incumbency protection.

I had hoped to see a much greater implementation of the Wilson amendment.

My colleague and chairman suggest that there are measures moving through the process that address that crack-baby problem, for example. I must say, as he points to that current reality, it also raises another point that is important for me to mention regarding this conference. There were aspects of our conference discussion that I am not very happy with or about.

When one comes into conference with the other body, they hope to have a candid and open discussion. As I talked about the Wilson amendment, for example, in that meeting, one of my colleagues from the other body, with information coming then from his staff, suggested that adequate funds already exist, in another appropriations bill providing $43 million for the crack-baby problem.

In trying to verify that statement over the last 24 hours, I concluded that it was, at best, misinformation.

One, minuscule amounts are in fact proposed—in a bill which has yet to complete the legislative process.

Two, of those sums, a minor $4.5 million might—and I emphasize might—be available for drug babies.

This is hardly an adequate response to the vote in the other body of 83 to 8 in support of Wilson—or to the 245 to 137 House vote directing our conferees to accept the Wilson proposal.

$4.5 million is a long ways away from the Wilson objective and from my objective. That sort of is misleading information in conference and does not lead to strengthening the comity that should exist between the two bodies.

Mr. Speaker, I point to that, because I want to say to my chairman that we have been able to work very, very closely together, and comity has existed. If we have that sort of what I consider to be misleading direction in conferences in the future, I may not be so readily aboard this train of comity as I have in the past.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of California. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to make sure our colleagues understood that the gentleman's concern related to statements made by people from the other body, and that the comments I have made today on the floor about where we stand in meeting this real human need are accurate. Is that correct? The situation is even better today having had the Senate agree to a compromise with the administration on drug funding yesterday. The gentleman is correct that on Monday some of the things that were said were, at best, prospective. They had not already occurred, but today I think it is fair to say we do stand in better position to deal with the crack-baby issue than we did on Monday. Is that the gentleman's gist?

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I think there is no question about that. But I must say to my chairman that at the time of our conference the gentlemen from the other body had no way of knowing what was going to occur, and they absolutely, in my judgment, were providing information for convenience to make a point that was misleading to the members of the conference. That is the point that I really want to make. I appreciate the gentleman's concern about the issue.

Mr. Speaker, we will have some further discussion regarding particularly the frank and those services available to the membership in this conference report.

During the earlier discussion of this measure when we brought it out of committee for its first hearing before the Members, I had planned to present an amendment which would have reduced frank mailing. It was my objective to reduce what is known as postal patron from currently available six mailings per year to two. I found that there was a good deal of concern about moving that far within the House on both sides of the aisle. I was encouraged by many on my side of the aisle not to go as far as a reduction to two. In response my amendment was changed so that it would have reduced newsletters from 6 to 4. As a result of, in part, the Wilson amendment pressure and in part the work of my chairman, this conference report reduces the postal patron services available from 6 to 3, further than my earlier amendment.

Progress has been made that is significant progress. My colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS], proposed an amendment that would make sure that such bulk mailing was out of our folding room and on its way to patrons' homes, by the current 60-day limitation prior to an election.

We are taking steps progressively to make certain that our mail is used to communicate with our citizens about those subjects of which they have serious concern rather than just to service ourselves for the sake of election politics.

The bill is not a perfect bill. We are progressively moving down the right path. Because of that, I urge my colleagues to look closely at what we have done, and support the conference report.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 8 minutes to my good friend, the gentleman from Wisconsin. [Mr. OBEY].

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Speaker, first of all let me express my thanks to the chairman for his time, and to express my admiration to both gentlemen from California, both the chairman and the ranking member of the subcommittee. They do a lot of yeoman work on behalf of this institution and the people we serve, and I appreciate that fact.

Mr. Speaker, I want to talk a little bit about the philosophical questions involved in limitations on the frank. I will not take what is I suppose a popular view, but nonetheless it is my view, and it is honestly held.

I do not know if Members saw "Nightline," but last night we had one of the most revealing discussions that I have ever seen on national television at least on a non-PBS network discussing the institutional arrangements between the press and the White House. And Michael Deaver, who used to handle press relations for President Reagan, said this about the national networks, he said:

> I found the network press fairly manageable. We gave you plenty of theater. We looked 6 weeks down the road and thought about what the picture would be. If you could figure the visual angle, you can make the evening news every night.

I thought those comments were very revealing. They do not say anything about partisan politics, but they do say a lot of things about institutional politics, the politics which goes on every day between the executive and the legislative branches.

I would simply point out that Mr. Deaver points out how easy it is for the President, whatever party he is, to be on the evening news every single night if he wants in communication with every single family in America who has the boob tube on.

In addition to that, the President has access, almost automatic access, to every single family any time he asks the networks for time. It is only on rare occasions when he is turned down.

Larry Grossman, president of NBC, on that same program last night after Mr. Deaver comments said:

> Well, frankly, that doesn't bother me much.

He said:

It's the President's job to set the agenda and our job in the press to follow it.

I do not agree that it is the way it ought to be, but I do agree that is the way it is. And it seems to me that has some implication for the Congress as an institution. Because what it means is that while the President has instant access to the mind and soul of America every night on network television, under our limited franking ability it means that up until now we have had the ability six times during the year, six times a year, once every 60 days to enter the dialog, if we choose, with a newsletter of our own telling people how we see the issues. I have here every postal patron newsletter that I have published the last 4 years in case anybody wants to take a look at them. That is what I have in the main tried to do. I do not pretend to be Percy Pureheart, but I have tried in the main to keep my newsletters focused on issues.

So I would point out that every time the President wants to he can go on national networks and talk to the American people. He gets to have his picture of things presented to the American people virtually every night. He can roll out good old Air Force One every time he wants and use that to help him in his effort to communicate. And I do not begrudge him any of that, because he is the President of the greatest country in the free world, and he needs access to the people he is supposed to lead. But so do we.

If we are to be anything other than lilliputian partners in establishing that dialog, we need to be able to enter the fray once in a while, and the only communication tool we have, since we do not have instant access to network television, and we speak in 435 different voices, the only tool that we have is to communicate our views through the use of the frank. And I would submit that philosophically postal patrons are a much better way to do that than individually targeted mail, because individually targeted mail usually winds up going to those folks who are on some list. The State of California, for instance, provides every Member, if they want it, it is my understanding a computerized list of every registered voter. My State does not do that.

But if you send to a postal patron you are getting to everybody, you are telling everybody the same thing, and you are getting to those folks who are not registered to vote, you are getting to the people who move too often to be on anybody's list, and you get to the people who are not so well connected that they are on every organized group list that can be pulled together. I submit it is a much more Democratic way to communicate with people, and it is a much more equitable way.

I would also suggest one other thing. People say the Congress ought to stand up and have more guts and do what is right and oppose special interests. Thats right. But special interests can flood your district with mail. The chamber of commerce can tell you and your district how you should vote on an issue; the AFL-CIO can tell you and your district how you should vote on an issue; the S&L people can tell how to vote on savings and loans; and if you are going to cast a tough vote, the only device you have to explain to everybody, not just the organized few, the only device you have to explain those votes is the use of a special parton newsletter. And we are supposed to eliminate the one tool which gives us the ability to do that?

Ladies and gentleman, I do not think that is institutionally the right thing to do. I do not think that serves the interests of the country.

I would make one other point. Before we become too guilt-ridden about our refusal to cave in to the Senate, I would suggest that this House does not need any lectures from the U.S Senate when, as the chairman pointed out, they have the cute ability to hide the true costs of their communications by charging off to the entire institution rather than to there own office accounts the cost of their printing, the cost of their paper. The also have the ability to go to a PAC, take $5,000 from that PAC, put it in their campaign fund and then again put that money from their campaign committee right into their office account and mail what is supposed to be official mail out of what is essentially political contribution money. That makes an institution that allows that either a wholly-owned or a partially-owned subsidiary of every Senator's favorite private contributor, and I do not think that is the way to do business.

The business we do here ought to be public business that ought to be paid for publicly. I thought not be privately financed by somebody's favorite campaign contributor.

So I would simply say, I do not like this compromise, and I did not sign the conference report because I did not think we went at the Senate enough in terms of closing their loopholes. But I recognize the spot that the gentleman are in on both sides of the aisle. It is a reasonable compromise. On occasion I do not go along with reasonable compromises. But this one is more reasonable I suppose than could have been expected, given the action on the part of the other body.

I would simply ask that Members to do one other thing. Vote today publicly the way you talk to me privately. Do not do what so many of you did last week when you voted for an amendment on franking and then came to us and said, "Look, I didn't want to vote for that amendment. I hope you guys turn it around in conference."

If you belong here you ought to have guts enough to vote today, on the board, publicly the way you talk privately when the vote machine is turned off. If you cannot do that, you ought to go home and stay home.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN].

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I hope I can concur with the gentleman's last statement. I hope my public position is the same, and I think the gentleman knows, as my private position, which is that when the House instructed the conferees there was meaning to it. Now were there Members who may have voted one way and meant another thing? Perhaps. If they all came to see the gentleman, perhaps that is so.

I thought our votes were supposed to mean something around here. I thought when we instructed conferees, that was supposed to mean something.

So I am going to suggest a difference in viewpoint. This is not meant to in any way diminish the members of the committee. I understand the difficult jobs they have. Legislative appropriations are not fun, and I must say I have been working with a number of them and have learned to respect and like them. But you can differ and in this case you are wrong.

Using the other body's wrongs as a rationalization for what we do is not the way mature adults must behave. I think that we must look at what our actions are. This House said that we were willing to give up newsletters. Are some of them real good? Yes. I will bet the gentleman from Wisconsin's are. I think mine are.

I even write most of them. So I take credit for the bad and the good.

But do we have to have a lot of them? The answer to that is a quick "No."

I did hear many Members saying this is awful, we should not be doing this; some of the same Members who said, "Let's take from defense to give to the drugs."

If you take from defense but you cannot take from newsletters, have we not gotten something a little worked out here?

Now the gentleman, the ranking member, says it has been a good compromise because we got down to three. That moves me a bit.

Why not get it down to one? Why not do a newsletter if that is what you have to have, that at the end you tell people what we have done and have not done around here?

But I would like to disagree almost totally with the gentleman from Wisconsin who says, "How else do you communicate?"

I believe in my district and in other districts there are radio, television, newspapers that do a job. It may not be NBC or the "Today Show," it may not be a CBS show that is cabled around the country, but they do fine work.

I think that is enough.

Remember, House, what you asked our conferees to do and which they ignored almost totally. I hope we change this back.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS].

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise to rebut the comments of the distinguished gentlewoman from Illinois and make the following observation: Whatever we do here in this body takes place in the context of a very fragile frame work. That is a representative form of government committed to democratic principles. It would seem to me that one of the significant principles upon which we operate here is the ability of people's Representatives to communicate directly with their constituency, unencumbered by a third party, not filtered through the eyes of a reporter or a television camera.

We should have the opportunity to communicate unencumbered by any other party. That is what representative government is all about.

The second observation that I would make is this: To associate newsletters that give us the opportunity to directly communicate, to keep the American people knowledgeable about what it is we do on a daily basis here, and the military budget is a flight into fantasy.

If we want to help babies born addicted to cocaine, then why do we not cut the B-2 bomber program where each plane will cost us in excess of $600 million per copy, a ludicrous notion at best, a plane that looks like a Batmobile, that serves no useful purpose, and has no useful function in defending the United States or bringing us major security?

What we have done, Mr. Speaker, members of the committee, is to deny ourselves significant concern.

I came here from the civil rights movement in the 1960's, to Congress in 1971, because people said to bring my concerns, to bring my pain to the floor of Congress, operate within the framework of the political system.

I am here to do it. So now you are denying me the opportunity to communicate effectively with my constituency. That is bizarre in the extreme.

This is a precious responsibility we have, a precious gift that we have been given, and that is to represent our constituency faithfully.

I choose not to want to keep them in ignorance. They have a right to know what it is we do and have a right to know what we do faithfully. They should not have to go to the press who are financed by commercials, to the television, financed by corporations. Public money in a democratic society to communicate with our constituency; we should not deny ourselves this precious right, and that is to communicate with our people, and the American people do support that.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to the gentlewoman from Illinois.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. I thank gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, no one is ever going to accuse the gentleman from California of not being able to communicate.

Mr. DELLUMS. I thank the gentlewoman for her comment.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. But this gentlewoman, who has also come representing groups that years ago were not represented in this place, believes there are better ways to do it than to continually do it at the public expense.

Mr. DELLUMS. I thank the gentlewoman.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE].

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, it is with a notable lack of enthusiasm that I rise to discuss this conference report.

We have achieved a partial victory, which is somewhat akin to kissing your sister. Postal patron mailings will be cut from a limit of six per year to three, effective January 1, 1990. The official mail costs appropriation is nearly $9 million below the House amount. And the strengthened 60-day rule for mailing newsletters before an election has been retained in essentially the same form as the Thomas amendment adopted by the House.

Also, there is watered-down language in here designed to bring some restraint on mailings when appropriations are running out. Under this provision, the Postmaster General is to alert Congress after the second quarter of the year, if it looks like we are overspending the appropriation for mail. The respective committees in the House and Senate are to consider regulations to assure that the amounts available are not exceeded. We shall see what that means when it happens.

This is all well and good, but what happened to the Wilson amendment? You remember that one. It prohibited any postal patron mailings, both newsletters and town meeting notices, and it provided $45 million of the savings from such mailings for treatment and prevention of crack babies. You also remember that 245 of you voted for my motion to instruct the conferees to agree to the Wilson amendment, which earlier had been adopted by the Senate by a vote of 83 to 8.

So what happened to it? Not 2 hours after the House vote, the conferees dumped it. Dumped it.

I tried to save it. I even offered an alternative amendment. After all, that is what conferences are all about—compromise. I offered an amendment which would have applied the Wilson amendment only to the Senate. Since they had voted 83 to 8 to eliminate their newsletters and spend the money on the war on drugs, I thought they would jump at the chance I was giving them. They could have applied the $21 million in savings to crack babies.

But they didn't bite. They didn't even nibble. They laughed. Can you believe that? They laughed at the thought of applying their own amendment to themselves. I'm disillusioned.

And it wasn't just the Wilson amendment they backed away from. Except for the ranking Senate Republican conferee, they didn't utter a word when the proposed compromise dropped Senate provisions calling for mail-cost allocations to individual Members and Senators. It dropped individual disclosures in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of what Members and Senators are spending on mail. It even dropped the requirement that newsletters carry the legend, "Prepared, Published, and Mailed at Taxpayer Expense" on the cover page.

No protest was heard when those provisions were dropped. Can you believe that?

Mr. Speaker, I have been around here long enough to know that half a loaf is half a loaf. What you see here is what you get. It's a start. For the first time, some reasonable restraint will be placed on postal patron mailings. Some restraint will be placed on overspending our mail-cost appropriation. And some restraint will be placed on the practice of winking at the 60-day rule on mailings prior to elections.

Furthermore, this half a loaf is probably all the campaign reform this Congress is going to get. Here it is, Mr. Speaker, campaign reform 1989. Is the system broken? Don't worry. We'll fix it. And here's the fix. Three newsletters instead of six.

We can build on this start in the coming years. We can depend on the leadership and wisdom of the chairman and ranking member of the subcommittee, my good friends VIC FAZIO and JERRY LEWIS. They will lead us to responsibility.

I am not going to tell anyone else how to vote, but I cannot in good conscience support the conference report. A majority of the conferees totally ignored the House and Senate votes on the Wilson amendment. I think we can do better.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONTE. I am glad to yield to the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman's review of what happened in the committee.

I was listening carefully, and do I understand that he said that when the compromise was offered with the Senate, with the exeption of the ranking Republican member, the gentleman from Oklahoma, they said absolutely nothing in opposition? Is that what the gentleman said?

Mr. CONTE. Yes, that is absolutely so. There was no opposition.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that response. And at various times there were a number of the committee there; is that correct? There were prehaps 10 or 11 Members who were conferees?

Mr. CONTE. There were other Members there, but the biggest shock of the day was when I offered my amendment and they laughed at me. I cannot figure that one out.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his response.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL].

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, at the conclusion of this debate and before the vote on the conference report itself, I will offer a motion to recommit the conference report to the committee of conference.

The reason that I will do that is the same reason the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE] gave us for not being able to support the conference report. The conferees fell short of the desires clearly expressed by the House in its instruction to them, and the desires expressed, in the vote of the Senate on the Wilson amendment, and other amendments to the bill in the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to no one in my admiration for the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO]. I was pleased to join in the ovation given him earlier in the day. I also realize that my position on franking costs may not be typical. I suppose that for every time I go to him and gripe about the unnecessary expense and the political self-glorification by the Members of themselves, perhaps more Members than that go to him and tell him they need this vital service to communicate with their constituents.

Nevertheless, I think the House expressed its will, and the conferees did not follow that instruction. Therefore, I shall offer the motion to recommit. I do not expect it to be successful, and yet it is the only way I have to express my objection to the actions of the managers.

Mr. Speaker, the managers did not come up empty. To be sure, they lowered by one newsletter the amount in the House. More importantly, they accepted the Thomas amendment and tried to close that window of opportunity given to Members who, if they were lucky enough to get their newsletters to the folding room late, could have them sent after the 60-day period was supposed to have begun after which they were not supposed to send newsletters.

Nevertheless, the public believes, and so do the editorialists, that the abuse of the frank is one of the prime abuses by Members of Congress of their privileges. I think a number of us saw the editorial in the New York Times of September 28 which indicated that this conference report is resulting in a loss of congressional credibility. Both bodies voted strongly to reduce the use of nonsolicited bulk mail and both bodies, at least the managers on the part of both bodies, revoked that decision. I think most people think that was a serious error.

Yes, we have reduced our postal patron mailings, but we have reduced our total mailing cost hardly at all. As I compute the savings of going from six mailings to three, based on the report of out postmaster to the Clerk's office last year, it looks to me like we are saving only a few million dollars in this effort.

The actual fact is that postal patrons letters account for less than half of the 460 million pieces of bulk rate mail mailed by the Congress last year. That leads me to believe that most of that mailing is notices of town meetings. They are simply used to clog the mailboxes of our constituents so they will remember what our names are on election day.

No effort was made by the managers to make any reduction in that kind of mail. As we hear from some of the other Members who have expressed themselves today, apparently hell hath no fury like an unstuffed constituents mailbox. Many of our colleagues, and the managers of this bill, insist they must go forward with all their congressional mailings.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am going to move to recommit this conference report to the committee of conference so that our managers can make another effort to see if they can do a little better.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, if there are no Members who wish to speak, I will close at this point. I think we are about to move to a vote. Many Members want to catch airplanes and go back to their districts.

I would simply like to say that I have as great respect for my Republican colleagues as any.

Mr. Speaker, I believe I am getting a signal perhaps from some of my Republican colleagues now, and I understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] wants to be heard. So let me state that I will suspend my remarks at this point, and after the gentleman from Pennsylvania has had his say, I will close.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS] spoke very eloquently from his point of view on this issue a few minutes ago, and I want to say to him that my understanding of representative democracy may be just slightly different than his. I think what the Constitution says is that this is a representative form of government where I am sent here to cast a vote. I cast that vote on behalf of 550,000 people. Those 550,000 people expect that vote to have some meaning, I believe.

The fact is that I cast my vote along with 245 other Members on the House floor for instructions to the conferees to say that we want to stick to an amendment added in the Senate that reduced the mailing costs by reducing franked mail. I think that vote should mean something. I do not think the House would go on record the same way in suggesting that what we ought to be doing is expending precious taxpayers' money for self-promotion.

Some of us are concerned that much of what we do around here with taxpayers' money ends up being more promotion than communication. I do not expect than in the final analysis we are going to get everything that I would like to see in a bill that comes to this floor. It seems to me, though, if we are sincere about the business of communicating with our constituents, that we could get one thing much further along than what the committee has come up with, and that is disclosure. It seems to me logical that we ought to be able to say to Members of Congress, "We think you ought to publicly reveal each year how much mailing you are doing and how much it is costing the taxpayers for you do that mailing." If in fact the object is communication and we feel strongly that we should be able to communicate, when the taxpayers ought to be informed as to what the cost of that communication is.

Mr. Speaker, we ought to be embarrassed by that sum of money if we feel that communication is valuable and important. So, I would like to see the conference committee have this bill back. I would like to see us get something a little bit stronger in terms of disclosure, and then maybe we can have a vote on the whole bill.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, this House, along with the other body, had an opportunity to make a sacrifice. The question was: "Are we willing to give up our own mass mailings in order to help 400,000 suffering infants?" The conference agreement expects us to say no. This Congress has made the choice to "toot our own horns" versus adding treatment dollars for suffering babies. Shame on us!

There is no greater abuse in Congress than the abuse of the franking privilege. We had an opportunity to give $45 million to infants, and instead we saved not even a measly $5 million by cutting back on postal patron mailings from 6 to 2. That's not a very good record to bring home to our constituents.

We know that the frank has been used by both bodies as election tools. Statistics prove that. Election year mailings are nearly double those of nonelection years. It is no wonder why 98 percent of this body gets reelected.

Not only did we give up the opportunity to cut all mass mailings, including town meeting notices, but we also gave up the chance to provide for disclosure and publication of self-aggrandizement. We also gave up an opportunity to mandate that Congress' Postal Service credit card should have a credit limit equal to the annual appropriation and the Post Office should stop handling congressional mail when the credit limit is reached. I am outraged and I hope our constituents are, too.

The Wilson amendment would have deleted all mass mailings over 500 pieces. The conference agreement doesn't even address mass mailings. It is business as usual. Congressional computers will continue to generate mail to constituents at ever increasing speed and rapidity—probably at even higher, first-class postal rates.

In 1988, an election year, this House mailed over 460 million pieces of third-class mail. We know that approximately half that mail was in the form of newsletters, or third-class postal patron mailings. The other half of the third-class mailings in the House is presumed to be in the form of town meeting notices. If we assume that the Senate has the same ratio, notices of appearances or the so-called town hall meeting notices cost taxpayers some $30 million in 1988. Another opportunity passed up.

Mr. Speaker, we could have made some genuine reforms in franking abuse. The House voted to support reforms. We had a splendid opportunity to exercise some self-control over our own mailing expenses. Instead we chose to perpetuate our own allowances. This conference agreement is like an elephant giving birth to a mouse.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the chairman, Mr. FAZIO, and the ranking minority member, Mr. LEWIS, for doing a splendid job in a difficult situation. The issue has been the frank. But I suspect the issue was forced because of what was essentially a prank.

The debate here has centered on the franking privilege. And if you will excuse the play on words, frankly speaking, as a member of the Franking Commission and as chairman of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee which has jurisdiction over the franking laws, I have been puzzled by the many assertions, claims, and inferences that there are widespread abuses of the franking privilege.

Mr. Speaker, since 1974, the law has provided that any citizen, and I stress any citizen, may file a complaint with the Franking Commission alleging that the franking laws have been violated and an abuse of the frank has occurred. Now, given the debate which has raged in this Chamber and in the media during the last few days, you would expect that the Franking Commission has been very, very busy; that it has been drowned in a deluge of franking complaints filed by angry citizens citing franking abuses.

But the record shows this is not the case. In the 15 years during which complaints have been filed, there have been only 92—an average of fewer than 6 per year. This hardly suggests a major problem. And, lo and behold, the number of complaints filed each year seems to be decreasing. In 1987 no complaints were filed; in 1988 there were only three; and so far this year there has been only one complaint filed.

One must remember that inevitably some of the complaints filed are politically motivated and are generated by election campaigns. Given this fact, it is obvious that the number of legitimate complaints are even fewer than the 92 recorded.

So, I have to wonder if the franking problem is really as big as some would have us believe; or, for that matter, is there a problem at all. The record suggests there is no problem, and I am inclined to believe the record speaks the truth.

COMPLAINTS FILED BY YEAR

1974, 18; 1975, 0; 1976, 9; 1977, 2; 1978, 9; 1979, 3; 1980, 12; 1981, 2; 1982, 11; 1983, 1; 1984, 8; 1985, 2; 1986, 11; 1987, 0; 1988, 3; 1989, 1; Total, 92.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, how much time is remaining on both sides?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HERTEL). The gentleman from California [Mr. LEWIS] has 5½ minutes remaining and the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO] has 9 minutes remaining.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there are any more requests for time on my side, but I want to make several points.

Mr. Speaker, I have a high regard for my Republican colleagues, particularly those who have spoken on this issue, and I mean no mean partisanship as I comment in the next minute or two about the relative use or misuse, depending on my colleagues' point of view, of the franking privilege.

I do think, however, that all of us should be aware that we may well develop opposition or have constituents who will be sensitive to the fact that some of us vote here against the use of newsletters and continue to use them, assuming they remain available to the Members. That is a concern that I think we should all have, lest we somehow seem to be hypocritical in the ways we deal with these issues. If I were going to mail newsletters I'd question the wisdom of voting against them consistently here.

I had a number of Members of Congress come to me Tuesday after the conference completed its work, and its work was reported in the newspaper, indicating to me that they were supportive of the work of the conference committee. I had not one Member come to me and offer criticism. There were 15 members of the Republican Party among this large contingent—I kept track of that group only—one had voted with me against the instruction of the conferees; 14 of them had voted to instruct the conferees to support the Wilson amendment. They congratulated me and the conference on the work we did, and I suppose that would not be surprising if one were to review the data provided by the Franking Commission to determine who sends five and six newsletters. We determined, for example, that of those Members who mailed four or more, now the number that would be illegal under our compromise, they were by a 2 to 1 margin Republican Members.

So, Mr. Speaker, there is no corner on the use of the frank here. We use it regardless of partisanship. We use it in all kinds of districts, Republican and Democratic, and that is understandable as well because public opinion polls show us that 77 percent of the American people think they do not get enough mail from Congress, and only 15 percent believe they get too much mail from Congress.

So, Mr. Speaker, the frank has a role in American political life. It is a historical privilege that we have, and I will be the first to say that there are some who abuse it. I would be one who is an advocate for the very existence of a Franking Commission on the Senate side because there is no such entity there, but even on the House side I would advocate a more aggressive role, filtering out more politically contrived documents, eliminating the abusive town hall meeting notices, et cetera.

I think we have come a long way this year. I realize that the Wilson amendment had a lot of emotional content. I think I made clear in my earlier comments the money for crack babies, at least $40 million, is going to be enacted this year, and maybe more. The House should not encumber itself in relation to the Senate by enacting an amendment that places us at a strong disadvantage as it relates to mail.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I would ask my colleagues to reject the motion to recommit the bill and urge its adoption.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I would like to again thank the chairman of my subcommittee for his courtesy as we have gone through this very difficult process. In closing I would like to mention that while it is easy for us to stand in this body and point fingers at ourselves as a body and as individuals about the amount of mail that we send. However, I think it is very important for us to realize, as well, that our constituents do expect us to communicate with them.

Mr. Speaker, the postal patron we have been discussing today involves a general mailing to all postal locations in our districts. In my case, usually once a year I send a questionnaire to my constituency by way of postal patrons. I usually outline in that series of questions issues, and provide the precise costs of printing that questionnaire, what the anticipated cost is for mailing, so that they have a clear picture of the total cost of that communication. I then ask them to respond to whether I should continue with such questionnaires. In my district, and I suspect in districts around the country, my people say—well in excess of 70 percent of those responding, that they want that questionnaire, that opportunity for exchange. Often we use another similar mailer to send out to postal patrons the results of what their response has been to the questionnaire.

Mr. Speaker, this bill has been described as one that makes significant progress in cutting back upon that sort of bulk mailing. We have cut from six to three. The purpose then is to send the questionnaire, perhaps a response, perhaps a general information mailer, to the public at large. We have made significant progress in trying to get a handle on this item.

Mr. Speaker, as we go about voting and for final passage on this measure or consider the motion to recommit, I would ask the Members to consider that some communication is required, and indeed this is the bill that allows us to do that communicating or choose not to do it.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for my colleagues' support for the conference report.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank once again my ranking member, the gentleman from California [Mr. LEWIS], for his good friendship, loyalty, and support.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, I yield back the balance of my time, and I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

MOTION TO RECOMMIT OFFERED BY MR. FRENZEL

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman opposed to the conference report?

Mr. FRENZEL. I am opposed, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FRENZEL moves to recommit the conference report on the bill H.R. 3014 to the committee of conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the motion to recommit.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5 of rule XV, the Chair announces that he will reduce to a minimum of 5 minutes the period of time within which a vote by electronic device, if ordered, will be taken on the question of the conference report.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 137, nays 280, not voting 15, as follows:

PERFORMANCE MANAGEMENT AND RECOGNITION SYSTEM REAUTHORIZATION ACT OF 1989

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 3282) to amend title 5, United States Code, to authorize the continuation of the performance management and recognition system through March 31, 1991, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Senate amendments:

SEC. 6. TEMPORARY CONTINUATION OF PROVISION RELATING TO THE SCHEDULE FOR PAYING THE LUMP-SUM CREDIT TO CERTAIN ANNUITANTS.

Section 6001(a) of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1987 (5 U.S.C. 8343a note) is amended by striking "October 1, 1989" and inserting "December 3, 1989".

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HERTEL). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will not object, but I do this so as to allow the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee to describe the bill, and I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ACKERMAN] for that purpose.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 3282 passed the House on September 19, 1989. The Senate has approved the bill with two amendments. The first amendment corrects a technical error involving the inadvertent omission of two words in section 3 of the bill.

The second amendment extends the application of the existing 60-40 split distribution of lump sum benefits to civil service annuities commencing before December 3, 1989.

The amendment is intended to continue existing law until Congress has had the opportunity to fully address pending policy changes in the lump sum retirement benefit which are contained in the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1989. Enactment of the short-term extension would also provide continuity and allow Federal employees to adequately plan for their retirement.

Mr. Speaker, the Senate amendments are acceptable to the committee and I urge the House to concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I reserved the right to object initially in the name of the ranking member of the subcommittee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, we have no objection to the matter before the House.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, from a budget standpoint it is absolutely essential that this bill be passed.

I seldom agree with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, but this is a matter of great importance.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3282, the Preformance Management Recognition Systems Reauthorization Act of 1989, as amended by the Senate. Among other provisions, this bill extends the current law requirement that retiring Federal employees can receive only 60 percent of their lump sum distribution the first year and 40 percent the second year. If this provision is not enacted, the law would revert to allowing employees to claim a full 100-percent lump sum distribution in the first year of their retirement.

Reversion to this 100-percent lump sum treatment would increase budget outlays compared to what has been contemplated in the bipartisan budget agreement, the budget resolution and the reconciliation bill. In fact, the reconciliation bill would further amend the law to allow only 50 percent of the lump sum to be distributed in the first year and 50 percent the second year. This reconciliation provision would reduce Federal outlays by $700 million in fiscal year 1990 and $40 million in fiscal year 1991 compared to reverting to the 100-percent distribution in the first year.

Therefore, I believe that we have no choice but to support this temporary extension of the 60-40 lump sum treatment until the reconciliation bill can be enacted.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill, H.R. 3282, as amended by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. FAZIO

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FAZIO moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and concur therein.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO].

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will designate the next amendment in disagreement.

The text of the amendment is as follows:

Senate amendment No. 6: Page 12, line 10, strike out "$124,532,000" and insert: "$48,000,000".

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the language in the pending motion as a violation of section 311(a).

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will suspend and let the motion be read first.

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. FAZIO

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. First the Clerk will report the original motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FAZIO moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6 and concur therein with an amendment, as follows:

In lieu of the sum stricken and inserted by said amendment, insert the following: "$115,661,000, of which $29,379,000 is available only for Senate official mail costs, to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate, $54,561,000 is available only for House official mail costs, to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House, and $31,721,000 is an additional amount for fiscal year 1989".

Mr. LEWIS of California (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the motion be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HERTEL). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to hear the amendment. I object to the request of the gentleman from California.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the motion.

The Clerk read the balance of the motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk read the original motion, not the substitute motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO].

Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] have a point of order on that motion?

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I do have a point of order against the original motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the language in the pending motion under section 311(a) and section 302(f)(1) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

This language violates the abovementioned sections of the Budget Act because it contains $31.7 million in new budget authority for fiscal year 1989.

Section 311(a) of the Budget Act provides a point of order against any bill, amendment, or conference report which provides new budget authority that would cause the appropriate level of total new budget authority for a fiscal year to be exceeded. According to the Parliamentarian's status report filed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 19, 1989, the appropriate level of total new budget authority contained in House Concurrent Resolution 268, the concurrent budget resolution for fiscal year 1989, has been exceeded by $16.6 billion. This language would add an additional $31.7 million to the amount of this excess.

Section 302(f)(1) of the Budget Act provides that it shall not be in order to consider a bill, amendment, or conference report providing new budget authority which would cause the appropriate committee allocation to be exceeded. The Appropriations Committee has exceeded its committee allocation for fiscal year 1989 by $1.3 billion. This language would add $31.7 million new budget authority to this overage, thereby violating section 302(f)(1) of the Budget Act.

I believe the motion before us constitutes a violation of both of those sections.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO] wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. FAZIO. Yes, I do, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, this is simply an effort to keep our commitment to pay for the bills that have been incurred. We are paying in this supplemental appropriation for the current fiscal year, $31.7 million which has already been expended. Rather than carry that forward into the future as has been the case in the past on occasion, we felt it was most appropriate to pay it in this fiscal year as part of the supplemental attached to this bill. This money ought not to be paid by the public through postal rates. It certainly has been incurred by the Congress. We believe that we ought to keep faith with the Postal Service and pay every one of the bills that come due for services rendered. I hope we will be willing to continue our record of having paid all our bills.

Therefore I would hope the gentleman would withdraw his point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Minnesota insist on his point of order?

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I do insist.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I concede the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HERTEL). For the reasons stated by the gentleman from Minnesota, the point of order is sustained by the Chair based on the estimate furnished by the Budget Committee.

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. FAZIO

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FAZIO moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6 and concur therein with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum stricken and inserted by said amendment, insert the following: "$100,229,000, of which $23,978,000 is available only for Senate official mail costs, to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate, $44,530,000 is available only for House official mail costs, to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House, and $31,721,000 which may only be expended in fiscal year 1990: Provided, That, of the amounts appropriated heretofore or in this Act, the following sums that would have otherwise been expended in fiscal year 1990, according to estimates made by the Congressional Budget Office under section 308(a)(2) of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974, as amended (P.L. 93-344), shall not be obligated or expended during fiscal year 1990: $998,000 of the amounts provided heretofore or in this Act to the accounts under the heading "Senate", the amount for each to be determined by the Secretary of the Senate, with the concurrence of the Senate Committee on Appropriations; $580,000 of the amounts provided in this Act for reprogramming under the headings "Capitol Police Board", "Capitol Police", "Salaries"; $195,000 of the amounts provided in this Act under the headings "Office of Technology Assessment", "Salaries and Expenses"; $900,000 of the amounts provided heretofore or in this Act under the headings "Biomedical Ethics Board and Biomedical Ethics Advisory Committee", "Salaries and Expenses"; $184,000 of the amounts provided in this Act under the headings "Architect of the Capitol", "Capitol Buildings and Grounds", "Capitol Buildings", with the concurrence of the House and Senate Committees on Appropriations; $282,000 of the amounts provided heretofore or in this Act under the headings "Architect of the Capitol", "Capitol Buildings and Grounds", "Capitol Grounds", with the concurrence of the House and Senate Committees on Appropriations; $6,934,000 of the amounts provided heretofore or in this Act under the headings "Architect of the Capitol", "Capitol Buildings and Grounds", "Senate Office Buildings", with the concurrence of the Senate Committee on Appropriations; $225,000 of the amounts provided in this Act under the headings "Library of Congress", "Congressional Research Service", "Salaries and Expenses"; $2,302,000 of the amounts provided heretofore or in this Act under the headings "Government Printing Office", "Congressional Printing and Binding", as approved by the Joint Committee on Printing, with the concurrence of the House and Senate Committees on Appropriations; $111,000 of the amounts provided in this Act under the headings "Library of Congress", "Salaries and Expenses"; and $3,578,000 of the amounts provided heretofore or in this Act under the headings "Government Printing Office", "Office of the Superintendent of Documents", "Salaries and Expenses", the balance".

Mr. FAZIO (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the motion be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. FRENZEL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman mind if the reading clerk reads for a while until I read it? I have just been given a copy of the amendment and I had not seen it before.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk continued to read the motion.

Mr. LEWIS of California (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the motion be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HERTEL). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I asked the gentleman from California [Mr. LEWIS] to go ahead with that unanimous consent on the motion in the hope that one of the two gentlemen would be able to explain the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, what this amendment does is move the supplemental for fiscal year 1989 forward into the fiscal year 1990 bill which we have just adopted. Essentially we reached the $31.7 million outlay figure which is required to pay for mail already mailed and costs already incurred by reducing outlays only in a number of items in the bill which are either conference add ons or are above the Gramm-Rudman baselines.

We have in the House kept our own expenditures below the baseline. But that is not the case with several other items in the bill. So we have reduced a number of items which we believe are above the baseline, and we have reduced official mail by approximately half the total amount of the $31 million that the gentleman's point of order requires us to provide in the fiscal year 1990 bill. That essentially is the way we have to meet the 302(b) requirements imposed upon us by the full committee and by the budget process.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FAZIO. I am happy to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I believe the gentleman has presented an ingenious substitute, and we have already dispatched a number of our colleagues to their home districts, so I am not going to ask for a vote on this.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad there has been a reduction, if I am correct, of about $15 million from this account.

Mr. FAZIO. That is correct.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his explanation, and I wish both the gentlemen well in their work in the future to keep our franking costs under control.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman's assent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. Lewis] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say that while the gentleman's decision to not call for a vote at this moment does help to maintain comity within this House, however, it may very well be the procedure that will make a comedy out of our relationships with the other body as it relates to the legislative branch matters. Nonetheless, I reluctantly support the substitute.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, in conclusion let me say that I believe the reductions we made are fair. They do relate basically to those items that were above the baseline. We were very careful to use the CBO estimates of the Gramm-Rudman baseline. They effect accounts across all the agencies in the legislative branch, and, therefore, I would ask the support of my colleagues for this solution that we have had presented.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO].

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will designate the next amendment in disagreement.

The text of the amendment is as follows:

DESIGNATION AS CHAIRMAN OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON HUNGER

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of section 103, House Resolution 84, 101st Congress, the Chair designates the gentleman from Ohio. [Mr. HALL], as chairman of the Select Committee on Hunger to fill the existing vacancy.

EXPRESSION OF APPRECIATION BY NEWLY APPOINTED CHAIRMAN OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON HUNGER

(Mr. HALL of Ohio asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Speaker of the House for his appointment of me as chairman of the Select Committee on Hunger. I thank him for that responsibility and for the trust he has put in me. I thank my friends who have spoken so highly of me, and I appreciate their comments very much.

We have a tremendous job to do when we consider there are 1.3 billion people in this world who are seriously sick and malnourished. Mickey Leland gave his life for this cause. During my time in Congress I have spend a good portion of my time working on this issue at it relates to malnutrition and hunger and the tremendous number of deaths that occur for those reasons.

The interesting thing about this is that it does not take any new technique and it does not take any new technology. We have everything available to make it happen. It just takes the will of all of us and the will of the Third World countries. The provisions are here. It just means that we must work together. I am committed to doing that, and again I want to thank the Speaker and note the friendship of many Members on both sides of the aisle who have helped me attain this position.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALL of Ohio. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HALL] for this deserving appointment, and I commend the Speaker for his consideration of the work the gentleman has done in the past in promoting resolutions and trying to find resolutions to the problem of world hunger.

Mr. Speaker, I know that the spirit of Mickey Leland must be with us today, and, if Mickey were here, he would be smiling at this point, knowing of the good, hard effort that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HALL] has given over the years in trying to work toward a resolution of world hunger.

Mr. Speaker, we commend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HALL] and look forward to working with him in the days ahead.

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN] for his kind words. The start of the Select Committee on hunger was his idea, along with MICKEY LELAND, and I thank him very much.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALL of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Select Committee on Hunger I want to congratulate the new chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HALL]. I know that he will follow in the footsteps of Mickey Leland. He has been committed to dealing with hunger problems of the world, as well as throughout this country, and I want to thank him very much for that commitment,

THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE PASSAGE OF THE BILL OF RIGHTS

(Mrs. BOGGS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, the First Congress faced the extraordinary challenge of completing the work of the Federal Convention which drafted the Constitution in 1787, 200 years ago today, on September 28, 1789. The First Congress made its most significant contribution to the new order of constitutional amendments that we know as the Bill of Rights, and earlier today, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. JENKINS] referred to the efficacy of its efforts in providing this body with the freedom of speech guaranteed in the first amendment.

Following a campaign pledge to his constituents, Representative James Madison of Virginia, often referred to as the "Father of the Constitution," prepared the text of a proposed Bill of Rights and was largely responsible for the House's consideration of the amendments in the summer of 1789. The ratification by the States of the Bill of Rights in December 1791 silenced the most serious criticism of the new system of government and allowed Americans to pursue this great experiment in republican government.

At 6 o'clock this evening, for the anniversary for the passage of the Bill of Rights the Library of Congress will hold a special opening of a major bicentennial exhibition, "To make all laws: the Congress of the United States, 1789-1989," which will tour 30 cities over the next 2 years. Present-day Members have the opportunity there to celebrate this special day this evening, and I urge that we take advantage of it.

OILSPILL LEGISLATION

(Mr. MILLER of Washington asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in the last 2 weeks, I have heard from a lot of people in my district. They all want what I want today—action on oilspill legislation.

There are two major issues of great concern:

First, Mr. Speaker, we should raise liability levels to meet those in the Senate bill. Those limits better reflect the level of liability insurance needed to protect the public and the environment.

Second, let's not preempt State laws. While I would have preferred to have one Federal system and one Federal law, I do not believe the bill coming before us guarantees my State the full protection it wants and needs. Many States—including Washington State have specially designed their oilspill laws to meet local needs and concerns.

Most importantly, Mr. Speaker, let's bring this bill to the floor. Let's improve it. And, let's pass it into law.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. GINGRICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I asked for this 1 minute for the purpose of taking the schedule from the majority leader, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT].

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH].

Mr. Speaker, obviously we have finished voting for today. We will adjourn until Monday next, October 2, and on that day we will have suspensions on the Calendar, eight bills.

First, H.R. 1335, the Veterans' Compensation Amendments of 1989; second, H.R. 88, regarding unmarked cremated remains in Arlington National Cemetery; third, H.R. 2594, naming the Department of Veterans Affairs Outpatient Clinic in Daytona Beach, FL; fourth, H.R. 2987, naming the Department of Veterans Affairs Medical Center in Leavenworth, KS; fifth, H.R. 2983, naming the Department of Veterans Affairs Outpatient Clinic in Mount Vernon, MO; sixth, H.R. 1358, Montgomery GI bill amendments; seventh, H.R. 1662, Torture Victim Protection Act of 1989; and H.R. 3275, Steel Trade Liberalization Program Implementation Act.

On Tuesday, October 3, the House will meet at noon, take up H.R. 3299, the Budget Reconciliation Act of 1989. We will be continuing consideration on that day. The prime matter upon that day will be the consideration of the Catastrophic Health Program.

On Wednesday, October 4, we will meet at 10 a.m. We will recess immediately and reconvene at 11 to receive the President of Mexico at a joint meeting. Following the joint meeting the House will reconvene for legislative business, continuing consideration of H.R. 3299, the Budget Reconciliation Act of 1989, and on that day we will be considering, among other things, the provision concerning the Child Care Program and attempting on that day to complete work on the Reconciliation Act.

On Thursday, October 5, the House will meet at 10 a.m. We will attempt to take up three bills: H.R. 2748, the Intelligence Authorization Act for fiscal year 1990, subject to a rule; H.R. 1495, the Arms Control Authorization Act of 1989, again subject to a rule, and H.R. 1465, the Oil Pollution Prevention, Response, Liability and Compensation Act of 1989, subject to a rule.

On Friday, October 6, the House will meet at 10 a.m., however there will be no legislative business, and of course on Monday, October 9, the House will be in recess because of the Columbus Day holiday.

Votes will occur again on October 10, but they will occur at 4:30.

I would also note that on Monday, October 2, we will attempt to hold votes until 4:30 in the afternoon to accommodate Members who are traveling back to Washington from their districts.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I thank the majority leader, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT], and I was going to ask a couple of questions, if I might, on some topics.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT] have any new information on when we might see the Nuclear Regulatory Commission bill on the floor?

As my colleagues know, there are a number of Members, including the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITTER], who are very concerned about that and feel it has a very timely amendment, and I wonder if there is any information as to whether that bill might come to the floor.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] knows, we have been extremely busy trying to complete the reconciliation bill. We will attempt to contact the committee that is involved and communicate with him about the plans for that legislation.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, second, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT] knows, the President's drug and crime package is still in the Committee on the Judiciary, and it is something which President Bush sent up in June, and I just wonder if there are any plans possibly in October to try to report that package to the floor.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, the committee is considering that legislation. It obviously has a connection with the drug package which we are going to be working on in the appropriation bills. We will attempt to see if activity will come out of that committee on the crime package.

Mr. GINGRICH. Lastly, there is a very real danger since we will technically be in sequester when we come back on Monday and within 2 weeks, on the 16th of October, there will be a real sequester cutting Federal spending. As I understand the procedure, the majority leadership on both sides will have an opportunity in both the House and in the Senate to offer an expedited procedure during the last 10 days immediately following the beginning of that sequester, and I just wondered if there are any plans to try to develop a bipartisan approach, if there are going to be expedited efforts to minimize or avoid the sequester.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA], the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee, for an answer.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA].

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Right now I believe we feel that the reconciliation bill, obviously with some of the changes occurring today, but nevertheless, we still feel that the numbers in the reconciliation bill are sufficient to meet the Gramm-Rudman target. Our hope is to complete reconciliation by next Wednesday, and hopefully the Senate will try to expedite their procedures so that we can go into conference very soon after that. At least as far as I know, there is no effort on this side to try to do any kind of expedited procedure, because reconciliation would basically respond to that.

Mr. GINGRICH. As we know, the other body has indicated that they may well be in recess for the week I think of the 9th. We just wanted to offer on our side that we would very much like to work on a bipartisan basis if we do decide that we are in a situation where we need some kind of expedited procedure, and we just wanted to say to the leadership on that side that we would like to be helpful in any way that we can on that.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, it certainly is my intent, and I am sure it is the intent of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] that we expedite this measure as quickly as possible once it has been passed by the House. That is certainly my intent, because I do think any time we enter into sequestration that represents a failure on the part of the House and of the Senate to respond to that responsibility.

Mr. GINGRICH. If I might say one last thing to the distinguished majority leader, something I said to the press awhile ago. I just want to go on record as saying that this was a very hard fought and difficult day and obviously of great importance to both sides. I cannot remember in my 11 years here a tone of collegiality and comity and, frankly, friendly competition that was as positive and as healthy for this institution as the one that Speaker FOLEY and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT], the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] have fostered.

I just want to give my personal thanks. I think the whole tone of the House has changed and these gentlemen deserve a great deal of the credit for that and we look forward to working with you. We are going to win some, we are going to lose some, but if we all do it together in this positive way, I think it is very, very healthy, and I want to thank the gentleman from Missouri personally.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his comments. I think it is obvious that we can have strong disagreements about the substance of policy without having personal bitterness or rancor. The House of Representatives is here so that these deep disagreements can be discussed and resolved. I think that is the House working at its finest.

We also appreciate the attitude and the amount of comity and good will that has transpired during this entire debate and we hope it will continue with other issues that will be hard fought.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

WORLD FOOD DAY

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 138) designating October 16, 1989, and October 16, 1990, as "World Food Day" and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GILMAN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, as the sponsor of House Joint Resolution 267, the companion House measure, I am pleased to rise in support of Senate Joint Resolution 138, which would designate October 16, 1989, as "World Food Day."

I want to take a moment to note that it is with great sadness that we bring World Food Day to the floor without our cosponsor our good friend, the gentleman from Texas Mickey Leland. Mickey was always a strong supporter of the many important education activities that took place on World Food Day. His leadership and smiling face is sorely missed by all of us.

Congressman Leland took an active role in legislative efforts to alleviate world hunger. Under his leadership the committee held numerous hearings and seminars on domestic and international hunger issues. Among the many areas explored were: Primary health care and nutrition initiatives, including support of UNICEF's child survival efforts and vitamin A activities; provision for United States emergency relief assistance overseas; use of United States surplus commodities in alleviating hunger; the linkage of population growth to hunger and the use of appropriate technology to promote family food production in Africa.

Representative Leland introduced the Food Assistance and African Agriculture Act to establish a special fund for small farmers in sub-Saharan Africa through the International Fund for Agricultural Development, as well as provide regular replenishment of funds for the multilateral agency which provides credit to poor farmers.

The food needs of Americans equally concerned Representative Leland. To better inform Congress of domestic food needs, Representative Leland led investigations into the nutritional status of the homeless, the elderly, the rural poor, migrant workers, Native Americans, infants and children, and other vulnerable populations.

Representative Leland introduced the first legislation addressing the comprehensive needs of the homeless—nutrition, health and other services, as well as housing. He also was dedicated to expanding Medicaid services and the special supplemental food program for women, infants, and children [WIC]. Representative Leland introduced legislation to set up farmers' market demonstration projects in low-income neighborhoods. He also worked to improve access to Federal assistance programs and to simplify their application procedures.

Since 1979, the National Committee for World Food Day under the leadership of its chairwoman, Patricia Young, has undertaken hundreds of projects and programs related to the world's hunger problem. Without World Food Day and the organizations involved with its celebration, the groundswell needed that made all the media events possible concerning hunger would never have existed.

Yet, despite the impressive outpouring of support, the problem of world hunger persists. According to recent reports 2 million people are at risk of starving in Sudan.

The worsening famine and misery there was of great concern to Mickey and it was during one of his many visits to Sudanese refugee camps in Ethiopia that he was taken from us. Estimates for the number of deaths range as high as 1 million, and perhaps as many as 3 million people remain at risk of starvation. In Aweil, southeast of Khartoum, 2,481 people died in May and June of hunger. An additional 8,000 people died of starvation there between June and September. The 1988 deaths from starvation in the Sudan are now estimated to be as high as 500,000.

These grim statistics underscore the critical need for a continued commitment of private and Government funds to ending hunger. But emergency relief aid is not enough. A concerted effort must be made to improve the deteriorating conditions that result in tragedy after tragedy—the same conditions that allow famine and starvation to persist and remain a reality in a world with more than enough resources to feed its population. It is time for us, for our Nation and the world of nations to work to prevent disasters from occurring—to solve the problems.

World Food Day has been an effective way to raise global consciousness concerning this issues.

Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to support Senate Joint Resolution 138.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HALL], who has now been appointed as chairman of our Select Committee on Hunger.

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, 5 minutes ago I was appointed as chairman of the Select Committee on Hunger, and I am excited to find this resolution before us, a most important reminder of what the problem and what the issue is.

I want to thank the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN] for his great effort on this issue. Even long before we formed the select committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN] was always in there pitching and working hard for this issue to try to save many, many lives. He is one of the founders, of course, of the Select Committee on Hunger.

Again, of course, he reminds us of the problem with this resolution. I cannot think of a more important thing that we can do in the Congress of the United States than to save lives. What more important thing can we do as Members of Congress than to speak out on this issue and do something about it through legislation. When the world and the media turns its attention away from famine and drought, which for the most part it has in the last few months, who is left really to focus on this tremendous problem?

I think this is one way to bring focus to it, because as attention moves away from the problem, the problem still remains, and it is 40,000 children who are dying every day, today, yesterday and tomorrow, as a result of hunger and malnutrition.

So I want to thank the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN] for reminding us about this problem through this most important resolution.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished chairman of our Select Committee on Hunger, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HALL] for his supporting remarks, and I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER].

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for leadership with respect to this resolution.

I also want to commend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HALL] who has just been named the chairman of the Select Committee on Hunger. It has been my privilege and pleasure to work with him as the ranking member of the International Hunger Subcommittee within that committee. His leadership will continue to make an outstanding contribution.

I think that as we prepare to pass this resolution with respect to World Food Day, it might be well to remember that only about 2 months ago the House took action to pass legislation, to pass a resolution with over 80 original cosponsors.

All of the members of the Select Committee on Hunger including the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Ohio, of course, plus many members of the Foreign Operations Subcommittee, the Committee on Appropriations, and the Committee on Foreign Affairs encouraged the President and Secretary General of the United Nations to act upon recommendations coming to them and to the world from U.N.-related conferences, from private voluntary organizations around the world, and from a variety of church and other leaders active in child survival and hunger issues. They have concluded on several occasions with unanimous support that we have the capacity to end basic hunger in this world if we simply take the resources that we have available from the private sector, from our governments, bilaterally, multilaterally with the help of the private voluntary organizations, concentrating our effort, that we have the capacity to eliminate the basic elements of hunger by the year 2000. I think that is a worthy goal, and I certainly would encourage the President to move ahead as our resolution indicated to establish a commission in the United States to work with the Secretary General and to provide his leadership in the international forum as well.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the passage of this resolution today will be one more step to point out how important this subject and a solution of basic hunger is to the world.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER] for his supporting work.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, it is an honor for me to support House Joint Resolution 267 which designated October 16 as "World Food Day." This date coincides with the founding of the U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization [FAO] in October 1945. This is the eighth consecutive year that Congress has supported this important measure to increase public awareness of the devastation of malnutrition and hunger throughout the world.

The global population is growing geometrically; agricultural efforts to keep pace with this growth is not fast enough, even though scientific research and technology in producing crops is progressing. Farmers are dependent on climatic and seasonal conditions. Soil erosion, decertification, and poor irrigation also contribute to the acute food shortage. Education in farming is essential in many parts of the world—overcomig centuries of farming customs is another hurdle which must be met. For example, food production has dropped over 20 percent per capita since 1969 in Africa.

We know that our colleague from Texas, MICKEY LELAND, was concerned about the hunger, malnourishment, and suffering that so many face each day. He will be remembered for his work in this field. I would also like to commend the sponsor of this bill, the gentleman from New York, Congressman GILMAN, who has diligently worked on the issue of world hunger for many years.

Hunger is a problem throughout the world—we find it everywhere, even in the shadows of the Capitol. No matter where it exists, it should not. We must join together and help to eradicate this scourge.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 138

Whereas hunger and malnutrition remain daily facts of life for hundreds of millions of people throughout the world;

Whereas the children of the world suffer the most serious effects of hunger and malnutrition, with millions of children dying each year from hunger-related illness and disease, and many others suffering permanent physical or mental impairment because of vitamin or protein deficiencies;

Whereas the United States and the people of the United States have a long tradition of demonstrating humanitarian concern for the hungry and malnourished people of the world;

Whereas there is growing concern in the United States and around the world for environmental protection and the dangers posed to future food security from misuse and overuse of precious natural resources of land, air, and water and the subsequent degradation of the biosphere;

Whereas efforts to resolve the world hunger problem are critical to the maintenance of world peace and, therfore, to the security of the United States;

Whereas the Congress is particularly concerned with the continuing food problems of Africa and is supportive of the efforts being made there to reform and rationalize agricultural policies to better meet the food needs of Africans;

Whereas the United States, as the largest producer and trader of food in the world, has a key role to play in assisting countries and people to improve their ability to feed themselves;

Whereas although progress has been made in reducing the incidence of hunger and malnutrition in the United States, certain groups, notably Native Americans, migrant workers, the elderly, and children, remain vulnerable to malnutrition and related diseases;

Whereas the Congress is acutely aware of the paradox of enormous surplus production capacity in the United States despite the desperate need for food by people throughout the world;

Whereas the United States and other countries should develop and continually evaluate national policies concerning food, farmland, and nutrition to achieve the well-being and protection of all people and particularly those most vulnerable to malnutrition and related diseases;

Whereas improved agricultural policies, including farmer incentives, are necessary in many developing countries to increase food production and economic growth;

Whereas private enterprise and the primary of the independent family farmer have been basic to the development of an agricultural economy in the United States and have made the United States capable of meeting the food needs of most of the people of the United States;

Whereas increasing farm foreclosures threaten to destroy the independent family farmer and weaken the agricultural economy in the United States;

Whereas conservation of natural resources is necessary for the United States to remain the largest producer of food in the world and to continue to aid hungry and malnourished people of the world;

Whereas participation by private voluntary organizations and businesses, working with national governments and the international community, is essential in the search for ways to increase food production in developing countries and improve food distribution to hungry and malnourished people;

Whereas the member nations of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations unanimously designated October 16 of each year as World Food Day because of the need to increase public awareness of world hunger problems;

Whereas past observances of World Food Day have been supported by proclamations by the Congress, the President, the 50 States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the territories and possessions of the United States, and by programs of the Department of Agriculture, other Federal departments and agencies, and the governments and peoples of more than 140 other nations;

Whereas more than 400 private voluntary organizations and thousands of community leaders are participating in the planning of World Food Day observances in 1989, and a growing number of these organizations and leaders are using such day as a focal point for year-round programs; and

Whereas the people of the United States can express their concern for the plight of hungry and malnourished people throughout the world by fasting and donating food and money for such people: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That October 16, 1989, and October 16, 1990, are designated as "World Food Day", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe World Food Day with appropriate ceremonies and activities, including worship services, fasting, education endeavors, and the establishment of year-round food and health programs and policies.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL DOMESTIC VIOLENCE AWARENESS MONTH

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 133) designating October 1989 as "National Domestic Violence Awareness Month," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentlewoman from New York [Ms. SLAUGHTER], who is the chief sponsor of House Joint Resolution 320 designating October 1989 as "National Domestic Violence Awareness Month."

Ms. SLAUGHTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for allowing me the opportunity to speak on behalf of a resolution that I have introduced to declare this coming October as "National Domestic Violence Awareness Month."

Domestic violence is an insidious crime that does not discriminate; it affects families from all racial, social, and economic backgrounds. In this country, a woman is battered every 15 seconds. And in half the families where a woman is abused, so are the children. This is appalling.

Domestic violence programs throughout this Nation have provided shelter for more than 375,000 women and children. However, for every woman provided shelter, two needy women may be turned away for lack of space. Currently, the Family Violence Protection and Services Act, the only Federal program specifically created to fund services for domestic violence shelters, has been severely underfunded. In 1988, it was authorized at $26 million, but only $8.14 million was appropriated. At a time when these shelters turn away 40 percent of all families that approach them due to a lack of space, it seems to me that the Federal Government must do more. "National Domestic Violence Awareness Month" demonstrates our commitment to expand programs that assist the victims of domestic violence and provide increased prevention efforts so that we can end this tragic family violence.

Yesterday, the House Judiciary Committee on Immigration, Refugees and International Law held a hearing on immigration reform and discussed the increased incidence of domestic violence occurring in marriages between immigrants and American citizens. The present law can trap an immigrant spouse in an abusive relationship for up to 2 years. I have introduced legislation, the Marriage Fraud Amendments Act of 1989, that will address this terrible crime. This simple clarification of present law potentially will aid thousands of victims of domestic violence. I urge you to support this bill.

I thank everyone who has supported "National Domestic Violence Awareness Month" and I ask them to support additional measures currently pending before the House to bring this scourge to an end.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, as an original sponsor of House Joint Resolution 320, which declares October as "National Domestic Violence Awareness Month," I am extremely pleased to see that it has received such enormous support. I would like to commend my esteemed colleague from New York, Ms. SLAUGHTER, for her efforts in ensuring passage.

While Members and advocates in communities across the country have been celebrating "Domestic Violence Awareness Month" for nearly a decade, this is the first time Congress has officially recognized it. Its passage today sends out a strong message that domestic violence is not just a woman's problem, or a family's problem, or even a community's problem, but a national problem. As such, it is a problem for which we all share a responsibility to solve.

In addition, passage of this legislation pays tribute to the tireless efforts and commitment of battered women's advocates, including the National Coalition Against Domestic Violence, and those of shelter staff, like those at Battered Women's Alternatives in my own community of Contra Costa County, CA, who struggle to provide services to battered women and their families.

Perhaps most importantly, its passage acknowledges the pain and suffering of the victims themselves, many of whom were brave enough to share their stories so that others might be spared the same anguish.

For, despite these exemplary efforts, domestic violence continues to claim millions of victims annually and resources to help them remain scarce.

As the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families has learned, at least 3 million women are beaten by their husbands, ex-husbands, or boyfriends each year. One in 12 is beaten while pregnant. About one-third of the women killed in 1986 were murdered by their boyfriends or spouses.

According to NCADV, nearly 2 million calls were received by State-run or local domestic violence hotlines in 1987; an additional 105,000 calls have been made to "Shelter Aid," a nationwide hotline supported by Johnson & Johnson's "Personal Products," since it began 2 years ago.

In my district, BWA received approximately 8,500 calls from victims in fiscal year 1989, as compared to about 7,600 calls the previous year. In fiscal year 1989, 169 women and the 218 children who accompanied them were sheltered at BWA, and another 277 women and their 363 children were sheltered in safe homes throughout the community. Nearly 2,000 women participated in BWA's legal program, 425 women in its jobs program, and about 1,500 women were involved in its support groups in the county. Nearly 500 men were engaged in BWA's model men's treatment program.

While domestic violence is widespread, resources to assist victims and treat batterers are limited.

Nationwide, there are only 1,300 shelters and safe homes for battered women, which housed only 175,000 women and about 200,000 of their children in 1987. Nearly 40 percent of women and their children in need of emergency housing were denied it due to a critical lack of space. My Sister's Place, the largest shelter program in the District of Columbia, for example, is forced to turn away seven out of every eight women—and her children—seeking refuge, or 30 women per month.

Shelters are called upon to do more than just provide a roof and a warm meal for victims. They are also faced with the difficult task of addressing critical medical, housing, and legal needs of battered women, as well as serious substance abuse and nutritional problems. In most cases, shelters are asked to assist battered women in getting back on their feet economically as well as emotionally and to help them live independently once they leave a shelter.

Federal support for these efforts is inexcusably inadequate. The House recently approved only $8.2 million in fiscal year 1990 for domestic violence prevention and treatment efforts, the same level as last year.

Equally meager is legal protection against domestic violence. Police are still reluctant to get involved in family disputes. Only a handful of States have mandatory arrest laws for domestic violence, even though arrest has been shown to be a strong deterrent to abuse. To the extent that such laws exist, they are not uniformly enforced.

By declaring October as "National Domestic Violence Awareness Month" we have the opportunity to bring this problem out into the open so that we might better assist its victims, and ultimately, prevent its occurrence. I thank my colleagues for their support of House Joint Resolution 320 and encourage them to help spread the word that we, as a nation, will not tolerate domestic violence.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 133

Whereas it is estimated that a woman is battered every fifteen seconds in America;

Whereas domestic violence is the single largest cause of injury to women in the United States, affecting three million to four million women;

Whereas urban and rural women of all racial, social, religious, ethnic, and economic groups, and of all ages, physical abilities, and lifestyles are affected by domestic violence;

Whereas 30 per centum of female homicide victims in 1986 were killed by their husbands or boyfriends;

Whereas one-third of the domestic violence incidents involve felonies, specifically, rape, robbery, and aggravated assault;

Whereas in 50 per centum of families where the wife is being abused, the children of that family are also abused;

Whereas some individuals in our law enforcement and judicial systems continue to think of spousal abuse as a "private" matter and are hesitant to intervene and treat domestic assault as a crime;

Whereas in 1986, over three hundred and eleven thousand women, plus their children, were provided emergency shelter in domestic violence shelters and safehomes and the number of women and children that were sheltered by domestic violence programs increased by nearly one hundred thousand between 1983 and 1986;

Whereas for every one woman sheltered nationwide, two women in need of shelter may be turned away due to a lack of shelter space;

Whereas the nationwide efforts to help the victims of domestic violence need to be coordinated;

Whereas there is a need to increase the public awareness and understanding of domestic violence and the needs of battered women and their children; and

Whereas the dedication and successes of those working to end domestic violence and the strength of the survivors of domestic violence should be recognized: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That October 1989 is designated as "National Domestic Violence Awareness Month". The President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling on the people of the United States to observe this month by becoming more aware of the tragedy of domestic violence, supporting those who are working to end domestic violence, and participating in other appropriate efforts.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL HOSTAGE AWARENESS DAY

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 400) designating October 27, 1989, as "National Hostage Awareness Day," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HENRY], who is the chief sponsor of House Joint Resolution 400, designating October 27, 1989, as "National Hostage Awareness Day."

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank Mr. SAWYER, chairman of the Subcommittee on Census and Population, and Mr. GILMAN, the gentleman from New York, for their efforts in bringing this resolution to the floor. While it is legislation for which I wish there would be no cause, I am truly honored to have the opportunity to bring it before the House of Representatives.

In the early months of 1985, while working as the chief Middle East correspondent for the Associated Press, Terry Anderson was taken captive in Beirut, Lebanon. At the time, he was 37. Next month, on October 27, he will turn 42—marking his fifth birthday in captivity. This resolution (H.J. Res. 400) seeks to commemorate this day by designating it as "National Hostage Awareness Day." It is my hope that through appropriate observances on the 27th, we will continue to keep the plight of the hostages in our thoughts and our prayers.

It should also be noted that during that week we will also see the passage of the 1,000th day of captivity for three American professors seized at Beirut University College in West Beirut: Alann Steen, Jesse Turner, and Robert Polhill. In addition, Thomas Sutherland, dean of agriculture at the American University of Beirut, Frank Reed, headmaster of the Lebanese International School, Joseph Cicippio, deputy comptroller at AUB, and Edward Tracy, an illustrator continue to be held hostage by various other extremist Islamic groups.

Two additional Americans, William Buckley and Col. William Higgins, may no longer be among those who are held hostage, as they are presumed to no longer be alive.

To honor these hostages, this resolution calls for the ringing of bells at noon on the 27th and other appropriate observances—the display of yellow ribbons, and the lighting of porch lights, to name a few of the ways that Americans can demonstrate their solidarity.

I am sure that I speak for all of us when I extend to the hostages and their families our sincerest hopes for the captives' speedy release. In the meantime, we will all keep them in our thoughts and our prayers—especially on this day that this resolution will set aside in their honor.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the major sponsor for this legislation. We should never forget the hostages, and we ought to be hopefully fostering diplomatic activities to release the hostages.

Terry Anderson happens to be, among others, from northeast Ohio, and I can tell the Members that the people in our region every day grieve for him and pray for him along with the other hostages.

I want to congratulate the gentleman. I think it is very important that we keep this issue on the front burner.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlewoman for her supporting comments.

Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAWYER].

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to bring before my colleagues House Joint Resolution 400, designating October 27, 1989, as "National Hostage Awareness Day."

At the outset, let me acknowledge the assistance of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Congressman FASCELL, in bringing this resolution to the floor today. House Joint Resolution 400 was referred jointly to Chairman FASCELL's committee and I would like to submit for the RECORD, at this point, the chairman's letter waiving jurisdiction without prejudice, to allow the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service to facilitate action on the resolution in a timely manner.

Mr. Speaker, October 27 will be the 42d birthday of Terry Anderson, who served as the chief Middle East correspondent for the Associated Press until his kidnaping on March 16, 1985. Since that day, nine other Americans in Lebanon have been seized as hostages; one has been killed and another is presumed dead.

Adoption of a resolution to intensify our Nation's continuing awareness of the terrible plight of American and other foreign hostages in the Middle East is enormously important. As we set aside 1 day to remember Terry Anderson in his fifth year of captivity, we must increase our efforts every day to secure the release of all innocent people held hostage in Lebanon.

The turmoil in the Middle East, both among and within nations, is historically deep and culturally complex. Too many forces with epic dimensions—religious, political, and military—have divided the region for too long, but the quest for peaceful coexistence and stability goes on.

But the seizure of innocent people as hostages will do nothing to further the cause of those who seek recognition in the Middle East. To the contrary, the United States and its allies can do little to promote genuine peace and understanding in the region in an environment where innocent people are held as pawns at the balance point in a frightful game of international coersion.

As we set aside 1 day to remember and pray for those who have become innocent victims of the unrest in the Middle East, let us renew our efforts at the national and international levels to win the release of our hostages and bring them home safely.

The letter follows:

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, September 21, 1989.

Hon. WILLIAM D. FORD,
Chairman, Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I am writing to inform you that the Committee on Foreign Affairs will forego action on H.J. Res. 400, designating October 27, 1989 as "National Hostage Awareness Day", without prejudice to the Committee's jurisdiction.

It is my understanding that due to the timeliness of this resolution, the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service would like to bring this matter before the House under suspension of the rules as soon as possible. Therefore, I have no objection to the consideration of this measure and would request that you make our correspondence on this issue a part of the record during Floor consideration.

With best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

DANTE B. FASCELL,
Chairman.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I rise to express my strong support for House Joint Resolution 400, designating October 27, 1989, as "National Hostage Awareness Day" and I commend the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HENRY] for sponsoring this resolution.

Our Nation has had enough, Mr. Speaker. Eighteen American citizens have been kidnaped in Lebanon since 1982. Seven have escaped or been released, Peter Kilburn was found dead in April 1986, and 10 remain in captivity or are presumed dead.

Terry Anderson, Thomas Sutherland, Frank Reed, Joseph Cicippio, Edward Tracy, Jessee Turner, Alann Steen, and Robert Polhill will not be forgotten. The scourge of state-sponsored terrorism must end. Iran has a moral obligation to call upon Hezballah to release these innocent individuals.

Efforts by national and international organizations have failed to win the hostage's release. Lt. Col. William Higgins and William Buckley have been brutally murdered. This resolution will help make the American people think about the plight of their brethren in Lebanon and I strongly urge its adoption.

Mr. Speaker, along with a number of my colleagues, we recently returned from the 33d exchange between Members of Congress, and members of the European Parliament. At that meeting, I presented a paper on international terrorism which I request be entered at this point in the RECORD.

TERRORISM: A MORE PROACTIVE STANCE

(A paper presented by Representative Benjamin A. Gilman at the 33d Interparliamentary Meeting between Members of the United States Congress and members of the European Parliament on September 23, 1989 at Los Angeles, CA)

Chairman Hoon, Chairman Lantos, and my colleagues, once again we take up an issue of profound concern to all of us and yet none of our nations have been able to propose any sort of reasonable solution. The West has been at loose ends. We were all appalled at Hezballah's apparent execution of Lieutenant Colonel Higgins, as well as by the notorious activities of the Abu Nidal organization. Yet, during our last few meetings the subject of international terrorism has been relegated to the miscellaneous category because we cannot mutually agree that it is an important enough issue to give it greater prominence on our main agenda.

When we last met, I implored our delegation to put pressure on state sponsors of terrorism such as Iran, Cuba, North Korea, Nicaragua, Iraq, Syria, South Yemen, and Libya to cease their support for international terrorist organizations. We all know who the culprits are, and we know how to punish them. Combatting terrorism must include a broad spectrum of responses. It is obvious that diplomacy alone is not enough, but it is certainly a place to start. We must consider the possibility of denying visas to citizens and representatives of any country that uses or supports terrorist tactics. We must consider canceling landing rights and port access of state sponsors of terrorism, within the limits of international agreements and regulations. These measures have been employed before, and on some occasions have been quite successful.

Permit me to share with you a quotation from a New York Times editorial dated August 2, 1989. The editorial deals with the Salman Rushdie Affair:

"In February, Iran offered $1 million dollars for the murder of Salman Rushdie, author of Satanic Verses, a book that offended many Muslims. In protest, Western nations withdrew their ambassadors from Teheran; most have drifted back, quietly.

"Terrorists and states sponsoring terrorism, like Iran, Syria and Libya, can only be emboldened by such irresolution."

It is essential for nations to follow through on such initiatives. Ministries of State, and diplomats, however, panic at the thought of complicating bilateral relations through such measures and often opt to do nothing.

In 1978, the United States joined with West Germany, Canada, Britain, France, Italy and Japan in declaring a willingness to suspend commercial airline service between those countries, and any country harboring hijackers. This is an example of a proactive measure that has a reasonably good chance for success.

Economic sanctions are another important weapon at our disposal, but we must bear in mind that economic sanctions require the cooperation of several countries to make them effective. The United States and the European Community must come together to place restrictions on trade; technology transfer; foreign assistance; export credits; foreign exchange; capitol transactions and economic access to any and all state sponsors of terrorism.

Let me briefly address another related issue which deeply troubles me. International terrorist incidents provide a staged drama for worldwide media coverage with the specific objective of embarrassing the victim nations. The media role in such cases is a matter of judgment and balance between the public's right to be informed, and the media's responsibility not to provide the terrorists with important benefits and advantages.

Legislative bodies are limited in their direct role in these matters, but some individuals in the United States have suggested passing legislation that would encourage voluntary media constraints. The following are some examples of voluntary standards adopted by the Chicago Sun Times and daily news:

(1) Paraphrasing terrorist demands in order to avoid unbridled propaganda; (2) Banning the participation of reporters in negotiations with terrorists; (3) Coordinating coverage through sponsoring editors who are in contact with the police; (4) Providing restrained coverage of events through supervising editors who are in contact with the police; and (5) Providing thoughtful and restrained coverage of stories.

The media is a critical link in the terrorist problem. Terrorism is a form of communication, and terrorists thrive on grief, fear and their ability to coerce others. We all must work together to reduce the role of the media in exacerbating the international terrorist problem.

Let me conclude by reiterating a theme I dwelled upon last January. We must all work together to eliminate safe havens for international terrorists. Virtually every operational terrorist group is linked to at least one government. This connection helps these groups access better weapons and intelligence information. We must continue to work together to combat international terrorism on all fronts and we must be ready and willing to adopt a more proactive stance. Let us not await the next mindless, wanton act of terrorism.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. EVANS). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 400

Whereas 10 innocent citizens of the United States have been held hostage in Lebanon;

Whereas it is reported that 1 of the hostages, Lieutenant Colonel William R. Higgins, taken February 17, 1988, was killed by his captors;

Whereas another hostage, William Buckley, political officer at the United States Embassy in Beirut, seized March 18, 1984, is presumed dead;

Whereas the remaining hostages from the United States are: Terry Anderson, chief Middle East correspondent for the Associated Press, seized March 16, 1985; Thomas P. Sutherland, dean of agriculture, American University of Beirut, taken June 9, 1985; Frank Herbert Reed, headmaster of the Lebanese International School, seized September 9, 1986; Joseph James Cicippio, deputy comptroller of the American University of Beirut, seized September 12, 1986; Edward Austin Tracy, illustrator, seized October 21, 1986; Jessee Jonathan Turner, computer and mathematics professor, Beirut University College, seized January 24, 1987; Alann Bradford Steen, professor of journalism at Beirut University College, seized January 24, 1987; and Robert Bruce Polhill, business professor at Beirut University College, seized January 24, 1987;

Whereas efforts by national and international organizations have failed to end the terrible plight of the hostages in Lebanon;

Whereas the fate of other hostages seized in Lebanon of British, West German, Irish, and Italian nationalities is uncertain; and

Whereas Terry Anderson has been held for the longest period of time of all foreign hostages in Lebanon: Now, therefore, be it

(1) October 27, 1989, is designated as "National Hostage Awareness Day" in recognition of the 42d birthday of Terry Anderson, his 5th in captivity;

(2) efforts should be made to have October 27 declared International Hostage Day by the United Nations;

(3) all Federal agencies and international agencies should increase efforts to secure the release of the remaining hostages;

(4) adherents of all faiths in the United States should pray for the release of all United States and foreign hostages in Lebanon on such day; and

(5) bells be rung beginning at noon on October 27, 1989, for one minute to honor the hostages in Lebanon.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MS. OAKAR

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Ms. OAKAR: Page 3, strike lines 10 through 12 and insert the following:

(3) all nations and international agencies should work to secure the prompt, safe, and unconditional release of the hostages by exerting influence, either directly on the hostage-takers, or indirectly on other involved nations;

Page 3, line 16, strike "bells" and insert "in addition to appropriate observances throughout the day, bells should".

Ms. OAKAR (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL JOBS SKILLS WEEK

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 148) to designate the week of October 8, 1989, through October 14, 1989, as "National Job Skills Week", and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. MARTINEZ], who is the chief sponsor of House Joint Resolution 195, designating the week of October 8, 1989, through October 14, 1989, as National Job Skills Week.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the gentleman from New York for the opportunity to speak in support of House Joint Resolution 195, National Job Skills Week. I want to take this opportunity also to thank Chairman SAWYER and Chairman FORD for discharging House Joint Resolution 195, and I also wish to thank the 282 cosponsors of House Joint Resolution 195 for their support of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, industry is telling us that we are on the edge of a job disaster because our work force lacks the skills employers need. Congress and the administration have a responsibility to ensure that as we move into the next decade we have done everything we possibly could to minimize the shortage of skilled employees.

With that in mind we offer this resolution in an effort to make our colleagues and the general public more aware of this challenge. "National Job Skills Week" will highlight many of the dramatic changes currently underway in America's workplace. The week will specifically focus on both private- and public-training efforts and will increase public awareness about present and future work force needs.

We will also increase awareness via a reception to be held Tuesday, October 10, from 6 p.m. to 8 p.m. in the Montpelier Room of the Library of Congress' Madison Building. I would like to invite my colleagues to attend this reception.

Therefore, to make "National Job Skills Week" a reality, I urge my colleagues to approve House Joint Resolution 195 by supporting the unanimous-consent request pending before you.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 148

Whereas the ability to maintain an internationally competitive and productive economy and a high standard of living depends on the development and utilization of new technologies;

Whereas new technologies require skills that are currently lacking in the national workforce;

Whereas experts in both the public and private sectors predict that a shortage of skilled entry-level workers will exist through the remainder of this century;

Whereas young people in the United States are experiencing higher than normal unemployment rates because many of them lack the skills necessary to perform the entry-level jobs that are currently available;

Whereas these young people will continue to experience higher than normal unemployment rates unless they develop the skills necessary to perform the entry-level jobs that become available;

Whereas American workers who face dislocation due to plant closures and industrial relocation need special training and education to prepare for new jobs and new opportunities; and

Whereas a National Job Skills Week can serve to focus attention on present and future workforce needs, to encourage public and private cooperation in job training and educational efforts, and to highlight the technological changes underway in the workplace: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of October 8, 1989, through October 14, 1989, is designated as "National Job Skills Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 117) to designate the week of November 19, 1989, through November 25, 1989, and the week of November 18, 1990, through November 24, 1990, as "National Family Week," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I rise in strong support of Senate Joint Resolution 117, designating the week of November 19, 1989, and November 18, 1990, as "National Family Week." I would also like to commend my friend and colleague from Indiana [Mr. MYERS] for introducing the House version of this resolution, House Joint Resolution 126, and to recognize his past efforts establishing the week including Thanksgiving Day as "National Family Week" for nearly 20 consecutive years.

This resolution serves as a reminder of the important obligation each of us has to promote and protect the strong traditions and values represented by the family. These are the very traditions and values upon which the foundation of our Nation is based. It is most appropriate that the week including Thanksgiving Day is designated as "National Family Week," for this is the traditional time in America when families come together for the purpose of giving thanks for the blessings which have come to them. Our Nation should also give thanks for the blessings of strong family ties and loyalties as a source of strength and freedom for our society.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join in support of this important resolution.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of Senate Joint Resolution 117, legislation requesting the President of the United States to proclaim the week of November 19, 1989, and November 18, 1990, as National Family Week.

I am proud to have originally introduced the National Family Week legislation in 1970, and continue to push for the annual observance.

The 19-year history of this particular commemorative is truly fascinating. Since its inception in 1970, more than 678 different House Members and 117 Senators have cosponsored National Family Week. In addition, each year a majority of the 50 States and the District of Columbia issues proclamations recognizing the annual Family Week observance.

The goal of National Family Week is simple; it serves to remind us all of the important obligation each of us has to promote and protect the strong traditions and values represented by the family.

One Presidential proclamation summed it up nicely when it stated:

America's families are a tremendous source of strength and faith and freedom for our children and our country, and during National Family Week we recognize this truth and pay glad tribute to the families of our land.

I wish to extend my appreciation to my colleagues who agreed to cosponsor National Family Week and urge passage of this resolution.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 117

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is hereby authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the week of November 19, 1989, through November 25, 1989, and the week of November 18, 1990, through November 24, 1990, as "National Family Week", and inviting the Governors of the several States, the chief officials of local governments, and the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL HEALTH CARE FOOD SERVICE WEEK

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 81) to designate the week of October 1 through 7, 1989, as "National Health Care Food Service Week", and ask for its immediate consideration.

The clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HASTERT], who is the chief sponsor of the House bill designating October 1 through October 7, 1989 as "National Health Care Food Service Week."

Mr. HASTERT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding and the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR] for helping in bringing this resolution before the House.

Mr. Speaker, today, with the support of 221 of my colleagues, we celebrate the passage of House Joint Resolution 141, to designate the week of October 1 through 7, 1989, as "National Health Care Food Service Week."

This legislation recognizes the efforts of all health care food service employees and honors them for their commitment to the well-being of all people. These hard-working professionals seek to assist those in health care facilities back to good health.

Health care food service workers provide a vital function by assisting in the care and treatment of hospitalized patients. Their knowledge of nutrition is an essential component of the care and recovery of those who are ill.

The passage of this resolution expresses our awareness and appreciation for the hard work and caring that is shown daily by the hundreds of thousands of health care service employees working in America's hospitals and nursing homes.

To all of you who serve our great Nation as health care food service workers, please accept our thanks.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 81

Whereas health care food service is a vital function of the provision of care and treatment of hospitalized persons;

Whereas health care food service workers, chefs, dietitians, dietary assistants, and administrators work in concert with other health care professionals to provide the best possible patient care; and

Whereas the provision of nutrition and sustenance is an essential component of the care and recovery of hospitalized persons: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of October 1 through 7, 1989, is designated as "National Health Care Food Service Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling on the people of the United States to observe that week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the several joint resolutions just passed.

The SPREAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

REAUTHORIZING THE NATIONAL FLOOD INSURANCE PROGRAM, THE FEDERAL CRIME INSURANCE PROGRAM, THE DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT OF 1950 EXTENDING CERTAIN HOUSING PROGRAMS

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking, Finance, and Urban Affairs be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 412) to reauthorize the National Flood Insurance Program, the Federal Crime Insurance Program, and the Defense Production Act of 1950, to extend certain housing programs, and for other purposes, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. WYLIE. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I do so for the purpose of yielding to the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ], chairman of the Committee on Banking, Finance, and Urban Affairs to explain what we are doing.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I thank my equally and perhaps more distinguished colleague, the ranking member of the full Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE].

Mr. Speaker, this is a very simple resolution. It would reauthorize several programs that expire this weekend. As my colleagues will recall, last week the House passed legislation extending several programs contained in this legislation. The Senate amended those bills and added authorizations for four housing programs. The resolution before us today contains modifications to the original House-passed bill which we believe will be accepted by the Senate.

This bill would reauthorize the flood and crime insurance programs—as required by the budget resolution—the Defense Production Act, and several housing programs which expire this Saturday.

I don't believe that there is any objection to this resolution in the House, and I thank my ranking member, Mr. WYLIE, for his support on this measure.

This bill reauthorizes the National Flood Insurance Program and the Federal Crime Insurance Program for fiscal years 1990 and 1991 and creates savings of $213 million, $9 million more than required under the budget reconciliation agreement. Both programs are due to expire at the end of this month and unless we reauthorize both programs today, we risk putting in jeopardy homeowners and business owners across the country who are unable to secure flood or crime insurance on the private market. This bill makes a simple reauthorization of both programs. No changes are made to the Crime Insurance Program, and only minor changes are made to the Flood Insurance Program to allow FEMA to conduct sea level rise studies and to issue reports concerning the effective implementation of the program.

The National Flood Insurance Program was enacted in 1968 and has served an important role in providing property owners with affordable coverage against flood and storm damage. The program encourages appropriate land development in flood-prone areas as a way to reduce the exposure of properties to flood and storm damage. The Federal Crime Insurance Program was enacted in 1970 and has become an important part of our national urban policy by providing homeowners, tenants, and small businesses with affordable coverage against burglary. The Crime Insurance Program encourages these families and businesses to remain in their neighborhoods and allows them to contribute to the economic viability of their communities.

This legislation also extends five expiring housing authorizations: The Emergency Homeownership Counseling Program, a key element in preventing foreclosures and safeguarding the FHA insurance fund; the major rental housing construction program in rural areas, the section 515 Loan Program, along with the Mutual and Self-Help Low-Income Housing Grant and Loan Program under section 523, and the demonstration of HUD section 17 rehabilitation grants in rural areas; section 520 defining rural areas that are eligible for all rural housing assistance.

Mr. Speaker, as Members will recall, the House last week approved a 9-month extension of the Defense Production Act until June 30 of next year. Implicit in the action was continuation of the present authorization level of $50 million. The House has already approved the same amount in the Defense appropriation bill.

The Senate acted on its own temporary extension yesterday calling for a 1-year extension and a specific authorization of $50 million. This is totally in agreement with the implicit action taken in the House bill, so we have no objection to actually stating it.

However, the length of the extension the Senate seeks—1 year—is too long and would put the expiration date only a month before next year's election.

This legislation would extend the Defense Production Act until August 10, which we feel is a reasonable compromise.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, as Chairman GONZALEZ stated, this resolution essentially incorporates the provisions of H.R. 2771, which the House passed extending the Flood and Crime Insurance Programs for 2 years, and the provisions of H.R. 3281, extending the Defense Production Act. We have previously passed both bills. The resolution also includes extensions for three rural and one HUD program.

FLOOD AND CRIME INSURANCE

Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the 2-year reauthorization provisions for the National Flood Insurance Program and the Federal Crime Insurance Program are virtually identical to those contained in H.R. 2771 as passed by the House on September 19, However, there are two amendments that were added by the Senate to the flood insurance reauthorization that I would like to briefly address.

The first pertains to a permanent authorization of certain flood insurance provisions that affect the collection of flood data. I have checked with the Federal Emergency Management Administration and it has no objection to this amendment.

However, a second amendment that would authorize a study of sea level rise is somewhat problematic. While this is an appropriate subject which should be studied, it would require FEMA to also gauge the economic consequences of a sea level rise. This estimation is not generally within the purview or expertise of FEMA. Moreover, the cost of the study—which may easily run over $1 million—is not provided for in this bill. Given the drain on the flood insurance fund this year from Hurricane Hugo and other disasters, it is inappropriate to pay for this study by taking it from the flood insurance fund, which is already strapped for cash.

With regard to the Federal Crime Insurance Program, many of us remain opposed to it, especially the caps on premium increases. With the assurance of the acting chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. ERDREICH, and the ranking minority member, Mr. BEREUTER, the Banking Committee has been assured that this issue will be thoroughly addressed if the crime insurance program is reauthorized.

So, while I have opposed the reauthorization of this program in the past, I will not object at this time with these assurances.

HOUSING EXTENSIONS

When the Senate considered and passed H.R. 2771, our flood and crime insurance bill, on September 25, an amendment extending certain rural housing authorities which expire September 30, 1989, was added. This resolution includes those rural housing extensions added by the Senate, but instead of a 2-year extension, we provide a 1-year extension.

Specifically, House Joint Resolution 412 provides for a 1-year extension of authority to permit the Farmers Home Administration to continue to operate the following basic and necessary rural housing assistance programs:

Section 515: Rural rental housing loans to provide continued assistance for low- and moderate-income multifamily projects in rural areas.

Section 520: Rural area classification extension for 1 year to permit FmHA to continue to establish low- and moderate-income eligibility determinations.

Section 523: Mutual and self-help housing grants. Extends the authority for FmHA to continue to provide grants for assistance to low- and very low-income families through nonprofit organizations to obtain decent and affordable housing.

Section 311: Rural rental rehabilitation demonstration. Extends authority for FmHA to continue existing pilot demonstration program to improve and upgrade substandard housing in rural areas to be made available for eligible low-income families.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, the House bill extends for 1 year the Emergency Home Ownership Counseling Program first authorized in our 1987 housing authorization bill. This program requires creditors of certain delinquent home loans to notify the homeowner of the availability of homeownership counseling offered by the creditor, as well as counseling services provided by HUD-approved counseling agencies and the Department of Veterans Affairs.

DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT

House Joint Resolution 412 also incorporates H.R. 3281, the Defense Production Act Amendments of 1989. These provisions simply extend the expiration date of the Defense Production Act from September 30, 1989, to August 10, 1990, so as to prevent a lapse in the important authorities of the act.

The Defense Production Act is the Government's primary source of authority for defense industrial mobilization in time of crisis and maintenance of industrial preparedness in peacetime. The administration agrees that these authorities should not be allowed to expire.

On Tuesday of last week, the House passed H.R. 3281, to extend the act 9 months. Yesterday, the Senate approved an extension of 12 months. A compromise has now been reached to extend the act for about 10½ months, to August 10, 1990. That is the provision contained in this bill.

Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely critical for the House to approve the proposed extension of the Defense Production Act. We simply cannot permit the act to lapse on September 30, as it is it would expire on that date by its terms. The Defense Production Act of 1950, as amended many times since, is the cornerstone of U.S. defense industrial preparedness.

It contains vital authorities enabling the President to require priority performance of defense contacts and the allocation of materials for the production of weapons systems that are used by American and allied forces in the field to defend against and deter armed attack. These authorities must be in place and continuously operating in the event of any emergency that might arise.

Mr. Speaker, the House amendment contained in my chairman's motion is more than a reasonable compromise. As Chair of the Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization, which has historically maintained jurisdiction over the Defense Production Act, I would have preferred a shorter extension. But, I feel certain that the Senate Banking Committee can complete its planned hearings, markup sessions, and floor action just as we intend to do within the August 10, 1990, extension period provided by the legislation before us.

Mr. Speaker, I have been advised that the Senate will accept this expiration date as contained in today's House amendment, and I urge the House to approve this measure.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, since the Crime Insurance Program was brought up I will comment on that.

I do remain opposed to extending that program, especially to the caps on premiums. But I have had assurances from the acting chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ERDREICH] and the ranking member, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER] that this issue will be thoroughly discussed in subcommittee and that the program will be addressed and we will have another opportunity to vote on it on the House floor in the not-too-distant future.

Further reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER].

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 412 which will reauthorize the Federal flood and crime insurance programs for 2 years.

As the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] has indicated, all of the provisions reauthorizing the flood and crime insurance programs which were contained in the bill H.R. 2771 on September 19, are also included in this resolution.

I have received information from the Federal Emergency Management Agency [FEMA] that they do oppose the sea level rise study which was included by the other body. While I can appreciate some of the problems they may have with the study, they undoubtedly are not insurmountable.

To address the cost issue which has been raised, I would only say that under the leadership of the acting chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. ERDREICH, and the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. CARPER], who has given us some very helpful input, I intend to support and help move a flood insurance bill through the Banking Committee as soon as possible. If we do make some of the statutory changes which are needed in the Federal Flood Insurance Program, then we will be able to achieve one of the long-sought goals of FEMA which is to increase the participation in the program. In doing so, we will more than offset the costs of the sea level study authorized in this resolution.

Concerning the Federal Crime Insurance Program, I would only reiterate my previous position which I believe also reflects the opinions of many on my side of the aisle. First, the Crime Insurance Program has been a waning Federal program over the last several years as more States opt out of the program and begin to provide insurance alternatives on the State and local level. While the cost of the current Federal Crime Insurance Program is relatively small, and serves relatively few States—almost 60 percent of all policies are written for New York City alone—it is no less important to the small business people and churches in those States that can afford no other insurance.

Furthermore, it may be premature to terminate the Crime Insurance Program prior to addressing the importance of this insurance program to the concept of economic enterprise zones and the implementation thereof.

FEMA, and many of the members of the Banking Committee, have objected to the caps on the insurance premium increases. This is an appropriate objection. However, the approach which we have taken with regard to the Flood Insurance Program is also applicable here. Rather than debate a series of amendments to these programs during the waning hours of this fiscal year, it is more appropriate to address reforms in separate legislation after the subcommittee has had a full opportunity to review all of the relevant issues, including the information from the hearings so capably conducted by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ERDREICH].

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his contribution and appreciate the fact that he has become one of the experts in the House on the Flood Insurance Program.

Further reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ERDREICH].

Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] that our subcommittee is going to move forward. We hope to go to mark up in the next 2 or 3 weeks as soon as we conduct the additional hearings. I will assure the gentleman that the concerns he raised will be addressed in subcommittee and in the full committee for full action by the entire House.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. WYLIE. I thank the gentleman for those assurances.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

SUPPORT FOR THE STENHOLM CHILD CARE SUBSTITUTE

(Mr. STENHOLM asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Speaker, next week the final issue to be resolved as part of the budget reconciliation package will be child care. At that time, I will offer a compromise substitute, which meets many of the concerns that previously had gone unanswered by earlier child care proposals.

Although my substitute has not been around as long as the so-called ABC bill and other proposals, it has quickly gained significant outside support from a wide variety of organizations.

Because each of these groups has taken time to carefully analyze the competing proposals and comment on their various provisions, I wanted to share with my colleagues their comments. I respectfully request that the letters of support from the following organizations be included in the record: the National Child Care Association, the Society for Human Resource Management, the Christian Life Commission of the Southern Baptist Convention, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Federation of Independent Business, and the Business Coalition for Fair Competition.

In addition, several other groups have pledged their support and I anticipate receiving their letters of endorsement within the next few days. When these letters are available, I will share their contents with my colleagues, as well.

Many people, both inside and outside the House are recognizing that the Stenholm-Shaw child care substitute is the moderate compromise they have been seeking. I urge all of my colleagues to study their options and vote for this substitute next week.

NATIONAL CHILD CARE ASSOCIATION,
Washington, DC, September 25, 1989.

Representative CHARLES STENHOLM,
Longworth House Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. STENHOLM: The members of the National Child Care Association (NCCA), representing 30,000 tax paying, small-business child care centers nationwide, heartily endorse your efforts to craft a bipartisan childcare, alternative bill.

We endorse your basic two-fold approach to a well-targeted, national childcare initiative based on increases in the Earned Income Tax Credit, and also the Title XX Social Services Block Grant program.

The genius of your bipartisan approach is that it eliminates both the ABC grant approach of Titles III and IV of H.R. 3, and most importantly, the extremely dangerous and shortsighted approach of Title II, the public school based initiative for four year olds and before and after school programs. This initiative flies in the face of the best thought out and tested theories of early childhood development coming from a wide variety of early childhood educators and pyschologists. In particular, warnings about the harm and inadvisability of placing 4 year olds in the structured atmosphere of public schools have been voiced by the immediate Past-President of the NAEYC, David Elkind, Dr. Norton Grubb of the School of Education at the University of California (Berkeley) and the National Task Force Report of the National School Boards Association issued in October 1988.

We applaud your alternative as the best approach to national child care policy.

Sincerely,

DR. WILLIAM J. TOBIN,
Director of Government Affairs.

SOCIETY FOR HUMAN RESOURCE MANAGEMENT,
Alexander, VA, September 26, 1989.

Hon. CHARLIE STENHOLM,
Member of Congress, Longworth Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN STENHOLM: Representing over 40,000 human resource professionals nationwide, the Society for Human Resource Management [SHRM], formerly the American Society for Personnel Administration, would like to applaud you for your efforts to improve the availability of affordable quality child care through legislation which provides for maximum local control. We support your approach because it creates incentives for quality child care without creating a federal entitlement or imposing unnecessary federal standards (or rigid state requirements) in an area best left to local control.

SHRM believes that the availability of quality and affordable child care is one of the most pressing issues facing Congress and the nation. Accordingly, we are proud to have been a forerunner in the business community articulating positions supportive of legislative action in the child care area. As early as January 1988, the SHRM Board of Directors approved the following principles with regard to federal legislation:

I. SHRM supports efforts intended to increase the availability and affordability of quality child care services through tax incentives and programs which provide for maximum local control.

II. SHRM believes that federal legislation addressing the child care issue should create incentives for providing quality child care but should not create a federal entitlement or impose unnecessary federal standards in an area best left to local control.

A survey of our membership indicated that cost and liability were the two greatest barriers to providing on-site child care. Specifically, we found that 77% of the human resource practitioners cited expense as a major obstacle to child care involvement and 76 percent viewed liability as a major obstacle to care. Therefore we support funding to assist states in establishing liability insurance risk pools for child care providers. This would ease the existing difficulty for businesses in obtaining liability insurance. We are encouraged that your Title XX Social Security Block Grant increase allows the states to use the funds for liability risk pools.

Additionally, in light of our concerns with costs and liability, we also support your provision for grants to small businesses which participate in a single child care facility or program. These grants will foster community resource coordination and cooperation as small organizations work together to address the work and family needs of their employees.

Employers have voluntarily begun to support programs to help parents deal with the care of children before and after school and while they are sick. We are encouraged that your initiative includes grants for these types of programs which would encourage such creative efforts.

We are also pleased that your proposal will encourage elder-tot programs by exempting income earned from child care from consideration under the Social Security earnings test for elderly recipients. Although the elderly are some of the most reliable and capable child care providers, they are often discouraged from providing child care because the extra income would cause their social security benefits to be reduced. By removing this barrier, one of the largest available pools of child care workers could be tapped. In addition to addressing the shortage of child care providers this provision would also encourage valuable interactions between generations.

Our child care survey found that the primary reason that employers have not implemented various work and family policies is because they have not yet considered them. Therefore, we also support legislation provision which foster information programs and encourage voluntary business participation in child care programs.

Finally, we strongly urge you not to limit or eliminate child care as a benefit under flexible spending accounts for employees (under Section 129 of the Internal Revenue Code). If there's one word that sums up the key to productivity in the workforce of the future—it's flexibility. Human Resource professionals are constantly challenged to best spend available dollars to meet employee needs. They must have the flexibility to shape overall benefit programs and policies with the various needs of their workforce in mind. We need more options for working families, not fewer.

Again, Congressman STENHOLM, we recognize that child care is an extremely complex issue. We applaud you for your efforts to carefully craft thoughtful legislation in this area and hope that you will continue to turn to us for human resource expertise.

Sincerely,

SUSAN R. MEISINGER, SPHR,
Vice President Government Affairs.

THE CHRISTIAN LIFE COMMISSION,
Nashville, TN, September 22, 1989.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE: Within the next few days, the House of Representatives will debate child care legislation. I am writing to share with you the concerns and perspectives of the Christian Life Commission of the Southern Baptist Convention.

The Christian Life Commission serves the 37,000 churches cooperating as the Southern Baptist Convention and their nearly 15 million members on issues related to moral concerns and public policy. The Commission does not address church-state issues, which are addressed for Southern Baptists by the Baptist Joint Committee on Public Affairs and the Southern Baptist Public Affairs Committee.

At the 1988 annual meeting of the Southern Baptist Convention, a child care resolution was adopted overwhelmingly without any apparent opposition. This resolution expressed the perspective that any child care legislation adopted by Congress should emphasize tax credits, state and local as opposed to federal regulation, principal benefit to low-income families, and separation of church and state. The legislation must be sensitive to the needs of the "stay-at-home-mom" and provide financial benefits that do not discriminate against parental home-based child care.

By these criteria, the proposal of Rep. Stenholm (D-TX) (which enjoys the support of Members of Congress in both parties), and the proposal which will be offered by Rep. Edwards (R-OK), most adequately address these deep concerns of Southern Baptists as expressed through their resolution process. They both rely primarily upon an expansion of the Earned Income Tax Credit and they both utilize existing programs rather than creating a new bureaucracy which would be more conducive to federal, as opposed to local and state regulation.

Thank you very much for your attention to the serious concerns of Southern Baptists regarding this most pressing matter.

Sincerely yours,

RICHARD D. LAND.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS,
OFFICE OF THE GENERAL SECRETARY,
Washington, DC, September 27, 1989.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE: I am writing to share the views of the United States Catholic Conference (USCC) on the various child care proposals now pending before the House of Representatives. It is our understanding that three major legislative proposals will be considered by the House under the rule dealing with H.R. 3299, the "FY 90 Budget Reconciliation Act."

First, let me address the childcare provisions contained in H.R. 3299. These provisions are a combination of two bills, H.R. 3 as reported by the Committee on Education and Labor and additional provisions approved by the Committee on Ways and Means [the "Downey/Miller" bill]. This package is totally unacceptable to the U.S. Catholic Conference primarily because of the restrictive provisions incorporated in H.R. 3.

The USCC has consistently advocated an inclusive and comprehensive approach to meeting the child care needs of the country which we believe was reflected in the recently passed Senate bill, S.5. Earlier this year on July 24 the U.S. Catholic Conference communicated to the members of the House its concern about the following unacceptable provisions of H.R. 3:

"H.R. 3 limits assistance to certain providers and gives no direct financial aid to families or parents. This approach would severely limit parents' choices in determining the best and most suitable care for their children.

In addition, H.R. 3 places severe restrictions on the participation of religious providers to the extent that, in our opinion, most child care offered by religious groups for qualifying families would be ineligible unless they significantly altered their programs to conform to rigid and unwarranted standards of complete secularization. To exclude these religious providers in this much needed program would significantly reduce the options for families, especially in inner city and rural areas where the needs are greatest."

In addition, both the Education and Labor Committee bill and the Ways and Means bill authorizes a new program of pre-school education in public schools. We believe this is an ill advised diversion of scarce child care resources into a program which merely duplicates the Head Start and Chapter I programs that are already significantly underfunded. This Title should be dropped from consideration as part of this legislation.

We understand that the House rule will allow only two amendments to be offered on the House floor. Both amendments are substitutes for the provisions contained in H.R. 3299. The First will be offered by Mr. Edwards (R-OK) and the second by Mr. Stenholm (D-TX). Mr. Edwards' amendment, as we understand it, provides for additional tax relief to low income families with children and does not contain any program initiatives with respect to child care. Although we believe that the tax proposal is meritorious, in our opinion, this alternative does not provide a complete response to the nation's child care needs. On the other hand, the "Stenholm Amendment" combines a similarly generous expansion of the earned income tax credit (EITC) with a significant increase in new funding for child care services through Title XX, the Social Service Block Grant Program.

It should be noted that the EITC provision in the Stenholm package is identical to the tax provisions in the "Downey/Miller" bill. However, unlike the "Downey/Miller" proposal the Stenholm substitute is part of an overall child care package which has none of the problems related to parental choice or religious providers described above. Consequently, we urge you to support the Stenholm alternative as a substitute for the child care provisions in H.R. 3299.

Sincerely yours,

REV. MSGR. ROBERT N. LYNCH,
General Secretary.

U.S. CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Washington, DC, September 25, 1989.

MEMBERS OF THE U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES: The U.S. Chamber of Commerce urges you to support the Stenholm substitute to H.R. 3, the "Early Childhood Education and Development Act." The Chamber strongly supports high-quality child care and believes that the Stenholm substitute is more conducive to achieving this goal.

The Stenholm substitute provides states with money that would assist in assuring that adequate child care is available. However, it does not mandate the multitude of regulations that H.R. 3 does.

H.R. 3 requires states to contract only with "community based non-profit organizations" for before- and after-school programs. Under this provision, small business for-profit child care centers would unjustly suffer unfair competition.

The Chamber would hope that an improvement could be made in Title III of the Stenholm substitute by the deletion of the provisions that place a cap on the use of Section 129, "flexible spending accounts," for child care. Such a cap sets a bad precedent for employee benefit plans and may impede the use of this increasingly popular employee benefit.

Thank you for your consideration of the Chamber's views.

Sincerely,

ALBERT D. BOURLAND.

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF INDEPENDENT BUSINESS,
Washington, DC, September 21, 1989.

Congressman CHARLIE STENHOLM,
Longworth HOB,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CHARLIE: On behalf of the over 570,000 members of the National Federation of Independent Business, I would like you to know that the NFIB will be actively supporting and using a key small business vote in favor of the Stenholm amendment on the Reconciliation bill. In addition to supporting your child care amendment, NFIB will actively oppose H.R. 3 and the Downy-Hawkins amendment.

NFIB opposes H.R. 3 and the Downey-Hawkins amendment. This amendment jeopardizes the very existence of small day-care providers. Not only does the Downey amendment seek to create stringent federal standards, without regard to regional or state concerns or needs but also places the emphasis on school-based child care to the exclusion of small, for-profit daycare centers. The dual issue of unwarranted federal standards and the bias against small, for-profit centers make both H.R. 3 and the Downey-Hawkins amendment unacceptable.

NFIB supports the Stenholm amendment. Your amendment not only avoids the pitfalls of the above approach, it also contains an important increase in the earned income tax credit (EITC) and grants to small firms to sponsor consortium daycare centers, at a substantially lower cost than Downey-Hawkins. The expansion of EITC is a particularly effective device to help the working poor.

Please be assured that the Stenholm childcare amendment will be used as a Key Small Business Vote during the 101st Congress. I look forward to working with you and your supporters to see that your amendment is enacted into law.

Sincerely,

JOHN J. MOTLEY,
Director, Federal Government Relations.

BUSINESS COALITION FOR FAIR COMPETITION,
September 25, 1989.

To: All Members of the U.S. House of Representatives.
Jody Wharton, Executive Director.
Re H.R. 3.

The Business Coalition for Fair Competition (BCFC) strongly oppose Title II, the School-Based Initiative, contained in H.R. 3. This provision would essentially legislate unfair competition by restricting before and after school care contracting only to nonprofit organizations. This would be economically devastating to the tax-paying, for-profit child care centers across the country.

BCFC supports efforts to eliminate Title II, such as the substitute offered by Congressman Charles Stenholm. His proposal would allow the present mix of day care options; church-based, family day care, nonprofit and for-profit to continue.

BCFC is a growing alliance of trade and professional associations representating thousands of U.S. businesses in all areas of the economy. Since 1983 the Coalition has been working on the problems caused by nonprofits engaged in commercial activities in direct competition with existing taxpaying businesses. We urge your support of for-profit, tax-paying day care centers as H.R. 3 is considered this week.

PRESIDENT BUSH MEETS WITH THE GOVERNORS IN HIS SUMMIT ON EDUCATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. EVANS). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. OWENS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. OWENS of New York. Mr. Speaker, the second day of the President's summit on education, where the President is meeting in Virginia with the Governors of the States to discuss the very important subject of education, has been overshadowed here on the floor by our discussion of capital gains taxes and other matters relating to the budget reconciliation. I hope that next week we will have an opportunity to focus our attention on this important conference being held by the President.

One of the crucial matters that must be discussed is why, before this summit began, there was almost a prohibition of a discussion of money, dollars, funding. It was understood that there should be no discussion of funding. It almost seemed that there was a threat to any Governor who came and mentioned money that he would be thrown out of the conference.

Mr. Speaker, I know from experience in the 7 years that I have been here in Washington that when a problem is really taken seriously, when the Members of this House or of the other body or the White House really want to solve a problem, the first thing they talk about is money. They never use that old phrase, "You can't solve problems by throwing dollars at them" until we talk about social programs or educational programs or programs that do not involve the expenditure of very large amounts of dollars but which benefit very few people.

For example, when the President brought the savings and loan bill to the floor, when he brought it to Congress, the first thing he mentioned was the need for $150 billion. They needed $50 billion right away. They talked very, very big money when they were considering subsidizing the crooked and corrupt bankers who had ruined the savings and loan associations deposits.

There are a lot of mechanics related to bailing out the savings and loan associations, but many of those mechanics were pushed aside. The Senate discussed the bill for less than 3 weeks. The discussion here was very limited. The mechanics of how to do it, the goals, the objectives, and all the kinds of things that are being discussed in this issue of education were not nearly as important as the amount of money that would be made available, and the emphasis was on making that money available as rapidly as possible.

I do know this: If we are serious about solving the problem of education, we have to talk about money also. I think we can take heart and be proud of the fact that our President is on record in a number of ways in favor of very important improvements in education.

No child should be deprived of a higher education for financial reasons. This was stated in a Bush issue paper some time ago. So the President is on record as wanting all children, regardless of their financial capability or the financial capability of their families, to get a higher education. So I hope the President also understands that in order to achieve that objective we will have to appropriate more money in the Higher Education Assistance Act.

Every child should attend a school which is clean, orderly, and safe and which provides an appropriate environment for learning. This is another Bush issue paper. That objective can only be achieved also with the expenditure of funds, either at the local level or the State level and probably the Federal level, because there are many school districts that are not able to deal with just providing adequate school buildings for the children who are attending school.

Every young person should complete high school and should leave high school fully literate, able in math and knowledgeable in the sciences, the humanities, and the arts. This is taken from another Bush issue paper.

Head Start should reach all eligible 4-year-old children. This is Bush on the issues of 1988. Everybody loves Head Start. Our last President, Ronald Reagan, loved Head Start. Head Start was his favorite program, but under Ronald Reagan, despite the fact that it was his favorite program, we never got enough funding to serve even half of the children in America who are eligible for Head Start benefits.

President Bush also committed himself to wiping out illiteracy in 8 years. He did that this year on March 29.

He committed himself to supporting a new GI bill. He did that on January 20 of this year.

Increasing research and development spending. He committed himself to increasing research and development spending on August 7 of this year.

Making a full-scale investment in high school dropouts and increasing and targeting money for chapter 1 aid to schools. On January 10, 1988, he made that amendment.

Increasing the Federal vocation educational role. On February 8, 1988, he made that commitment.

Annually addressing the state of American education, meeting with all the Governors to discuss the most urgent problems facing our schools. These last two, annually addressing the state of education in our Nation and meeting with the Governors to discuss the most urgent problems facing our schools, are apparently being addressed now. That obligation, I assume, is being met in this conference, this summit that is being held this week, yesterday, today, and, I believe, on part of tomorrow. That does not cost very much money. There is no outlay involved in that.

But for all these other improvements, we will have to spend money. We cannot take seriously the results of this conference if we do not make a commitment to spend more funds.

Under the last administration the Federal commitment to spending for education of the Federal level went down. We hope this President, after having this summit, will guarantee a forward movement by making a commitment to increase the Federal expenditure to education to some degree.

GEORGE THATCHER: A LEADER IN THE MAGNOLIA STATE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, just prior to his death, our colleague Larkin Smith was preparing remarks in honor of a constituent of his, George Thatcher of Gulfport. George has been one of the most trusted and effective leaders on our Mississippi Gulf Coast. Since Larkin can't submit those remarks, I want to enter into the RECORD this tribute to George.

TRIBUTE TO GEORGE THATCHER

(By Hon. Larkin Smith)

Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to direct the attention of the House to Mr. George Thatcher of Gulfport, Mississippi.

In January of 1989, the Gulfport city council unanimously appointed George Thatcher to serve as interim Ward 2 councilman of Gulfport, following the death of the ward 2 councilman. Upon completing his interim appointment, Mr. Thatcher chose not to be a candidate for that post and concluded his service on July 1, 1989. During those months, George Thatcher ably served Gulfport.

Upon concluding his term, George Thatcher offered the following poignant comments, which reflect considerable leadership and wisdom:

Serving on the Gulfport City Council for five months has been an interesting and enlightening experience for me.

The mayor, other councilmen, the staff, the new mayor and new councilmen—all have been pleasant and unanimous in wanting the best for Gulfport and its people.

So the following comments are not critical of anyone.

As one who has an abiding love for this community, I have been asked to set forth some considerations for the new administration to evaluate.

Taxes: The taxpayer needs relief. Every year taxes are increased. New economics must be found even if it means eliminating some services. Too, it is burdensome for Gulfport taxpayers to pay high taxes to Harrison county for which they receive little benefit.

Objectives: City government should take the leadership in developing both long-term and short-term community objectives in writing. There should be a community consensus in which private citizens, as well as the chamber of commerce and civic clubs, under city leadership set high, specific, attainable, stretch objectives.

We should strive to give purpose and direction to a great deal of unused talent now latent in the community. With teamwork much can be accomplished.

A general objective should be to aim high, to make Gulfport the most attractive, best community in the state.

Metro government: Metropolitan government is the wave of the future! If local governments consolidate, they could benefit from economics of scale (i.e. one police department, one water system, etc.) The consolidation of the chambers of commerce is a harbinger of what should happen with enlightened leadership in government.

Annexation: Bounded on the east by Biloxi, the west by Long Beach, the south by the Mississippi Sound, Gulfport can expand only to the north. Municipalities must grow, or they wither. The mayor and council should move ahead to complete annexation. Recent state supreme court decisions favor annexation, increasing the probability that annexation will be approved.

City services: Contracting with outside firms to perform services should be considered. Private companies provide services for less tax dollars than government. Garbage collection is now performed very efficiently by a private company. Why not consider expanding the practice?

Bond issues: All bond issues should be submitted to the people in public elections.

Executive sessions: Meetings of the City Council should be open so that any citizen or media representative may attend. Only in the most unusual circumstances should the council operate privately, and then the text of the meeting should be revealed to the public at the earliest moment. Let the sun shine in!

City attorney: Although I felt the city should continue to be represented by outside legal counsel, I understand the council's reason for creating a legal department staffed by a lawyer-employee and legal secretary. This department should take care of all city legal work, including bond issues.

Care should be taken to keep the legal office from mushrooming into a large bureau. The city attorney should be readily terminated so as not to permit entrenched mediocrity in the future.

Community Development Commission: This agency and the Economic and Development Services office should be reorganized as a department of the city, so that the mayor and council can exert proper managerial oversight of their activities.

Public schools: The Gulfport Separate School District spends a large percentage of the taxes levied by the City of Gulfport. Under state law, the mayor and council must accede to the school's request for funds without question.

Each year the schools require more tax money. This year is no exception.

The school board should be asked to reexamine the curriculum and the expenditures for possible economics. The product of the school should be proficient graduates who can read, write and do arithmetic effectively.

Taxpayers should expect no less. Gulfport needs innovative leadership to find better ways of setting and achieving lofty education objectives, including adult literacy.

Accounting: The mayor and council should require a better financial reporting system than they now have. Reports should be clear and detailed for easy understanding. Summary reports, comparing current year with past years, are necessary. The mayor and council cannot make reasoned, responsible decisions unless they have the financial data upon which to make them.

City employees: Every city employee, including elected officials, should remember that he is a public servant. The employees should be encouraged to be polite, helpful and understanding at all times in their dealings with the public. Taxpayer deserve no less.

Cooperation: It is essential that the mayor and the council develop good working relationships with each other. All have a common goal—the welfare of Gulfport. There is no room for pettiness or anger or egos. Need of the common good should rise above personalities.

Form of government: The strong mayor-council form of government is best for Gulfport. It is comparable to a corporation in the private sector. The mayor is chief executive. The council sets broad policy and acts as a board of directors—the legislative arm of the city. It is the mayor who implements policy. Even with the approval of annexation, consideration should be given to limiting council membership to five—the smaller the better.

Beautification: The city's garden clubs and civic clubs should be enlisted in an organized long-term program to clean up, plant flowers and beautify, encouraging all homeowners to participate. Consideration should be given to enrolling Gulfport in the "Tree City USA" program sponsored by the National Arbor Day Foundation.

When I was a boy, and later too, Gulfport was the dominant city of the Mississippi Coast. There was a pride of place, a feeling of confidence in the future, a conviction that Gulfport would continue to grow and flourish.

Now once again I sense a renaissance here. There is resolve to build a better community. We are looking beyond the reality of today and dreaming of the future.

All to what end? The creation of a better place to live and work, a place for our children and grandchildren to live happy and rewarding lives.

The people of Gulfport are ready to respond enthusiastically to the challenge of new leadership.

Gulfport was indeed fortunate to have the service of George Thatcher. Active in civic and church affairs, Mr. Thatcher is Chairman of the coast division of Magnolia Federal Bank. He is past president of the Gulfport Area Chamber of Commerce, and he is a director of the new Mississippi Coast Chamber of Commerce. George Thatcher represents the highest quality of leadership in Mississippi, and we are very proud of him.

PROTECTION OF OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DERRICK] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, at the suggestion of a Federal judge in my district I am today pleased to introduce legislation which will make it a Federal offense to assault, attempt to kill, or to kill a Federal public defender engaged in or on account of the performance of his official duties. I hope my colleagues will support this worthwhile measure.

Section 1114 of title 18, United States Code, entitled "Protection of Officers and Employees of the United States," makes it a Federal offense to kill or attempt to kill certain U.S. Government employees while engaged in or on account of their official duties. Congress designed section 1114 to protect Federal employees whose jobs bring them into contact with individuals who may wish to use any means at their disposal to prevent them from performing their duties. Now included within the purview of section 1114 are such officials as judges, magistrates, U.S. attorneys, agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Drug Enforcement Administration, postal workers, customs agents, game wardens, probation and pre-trial services officers, corrections officers, and numerous other law enforcement and related employees of our Government. Clearly these employees and others included in the section perform crucial functions under extremely dangerous conditions and literally put their lives on the line. However, recent events demonstrate that Federal public defenders face similar dangers in the course of their defense duties. I believe they should enjoy the protections of section 1114 as well.

For example, just last month a defendant in the court of Senior Judge Charles Simons, Jr., of the District of South Carolina threatened to kill his attorney, a Federal public defender, during the course of a criminal trial. Judge Simons pointed out in a recent letter to me that since Federal public defenders are not included in section 1114, it would not have been a Federal offense for the defendant to carry out his threat.

An informal survey of public defenders across the country recently conducted by Mr. Parks Small, the Federal public defender for the district of South Carolina and a member of the Federal Defender Advisory Committee, reveals that there have been at least three other cases in the last year in which defenders have become the subjects of serious threats. Another incident involved an assault with a firearm upon a defender.

Unfortunately, these events prove that Federal public defenders, like the other Federal officers and employees enumerated in section 1114, do in fact encounter in the course of their official duties individuals who may pose some degree of threat to them because of those duties. Congress should act quickly to add Federal public defenders to the list of officers and employees protected by section 1114, which is why I propose this legislation today. Although section 1114 itself prohibits only the killing or attempted killing of the enumerated officers and employees, this legislation will also act through section 111 of title 18 to prohibit forcible assaults upon or interference with Federal public defenders engaged in the performance of their official duties.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to give this important measure their serious consideration. Federal public defenders are vital to the Federal courts as the officers who give effect to the sixth amendment right to counsel in cases involving the indigent. Theirs is difficult work, even under the best of circumstances; this Government owes those dedicated attorneys willing to undertake it to the fullest protection the law can provide.

I would like to thank Judge Simons for bringing this matter to my attention and Parks Small for his assistance in preparing this legislation.

INTRODUCTION OF THE CONSUMER SEAFOOD SAFETY ACT OF 1989

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GLICKMAN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, each year, we eat over 3 billion pounds of seafood. The seafood industry generates nearly $8 billion dollars annually in sales and altogether, the fish and seafood industries are responsible for some $30 billion each year in economic activity. Over the past 15 years, fish and seafood consumption has risen gradually, until in 1988 when annual per capita consumption dropped from its peak the previous year of over 15 pounds.

In spite of growing health consciousness among most Americans and a gradual diversity in diets to include a wider variety of proteins, which spurred the growth in fish consumption, it has been, ironically, the same concern which has caused the downturn in fish consumption.

Today, I am introducing legislation, the "Consumer Seafood Safety Act of 1989," which I believe will go far toward alleviating these concerns and will assure all Americans of the wholesomeness of fish and seafood.

Unlike other beef, pork, or poultry, fish and seafood are not subject to mandatory inspection programs to assure consumers of their safety. The consequences of not having in place such a program are disturbing. The numbers speak for themselves: Seafood is 25 times more likely to cause food-borne illnesses than beef and 16 times more likely than poultry. According to further studies by the Centers for Disease Control, between 1982 and 1986, contaminated fish was responsible for over one-half of the food-related illnesses in the United States.

In spite of these alarming figures, the Food and Drug Administration, which is responsible for inspecting all fish and seafood in interstate commerce, does, at best, a spotty job of catching problems. Barely one-quarter of the businesses handling seafood and fish are inspected each year to protect the public from contamination. Compare this to the inspection programs in place for the beef, pork, and poultry industries, which I admit and recognize need improvements, which require facilities to be inspected each day.

Other efforts fare little better: In 1987, four of five of the top shellfish-producing States were out of compliance with FDA's guidelines and another Federal effort, the Commerce Department's program of inspection, is voluntary and not comprehensive.

Not only has the public grown concerned about this problem, as reflected in dropping levels of consumption, but so too has the industry. The industry trade association agreed earlier this year that mandatory seafood inspection on a Federal level is vitally needed, joining health and consumer groups who have for long advocated such a program.

To date, several pieces of legislation have been introduced to correct the holes in the present food inspection system in the United States. They take various approaches, some building on existing programs and bolstering those efforts. My approach is, I believe, somewhat different and will bring together the strengths and expertise that different Federal agencies have and can bring to bear to solve this pressing health problem.

This bill, "The Consumer Seafood Safety Act of 1989," will vest primary responsibility for a water to dinner table inspection program with the Department of Agriculture. However, in developing and implementing this program, the Secretary of Agriculture will be required to rely upon the expertise of the FDA in developing standards for keeping contaminated fish from the food chain. Further, the Secretary of Agriculture will rely on the advice and consultation of the Secretary of Commerce, who has expertise in marine issues, to prevent harvesting of seafood from contaminated areas.

Let me point out one key component of my legislation, the developing of standards of adulteration. The Agriculture Secretary will be required to determine adulteration based on standards developed by the FDA, in conjunction with the National Academy of Standards. These standards will contain limits on microbiological and chemical residues, which the General Accounting Office has identified as one of the primary causes of contamination in fish. This GAO report indicated that fish, of all foods in the average household market basket, have the highest levels of these contaminants. I believe the detecting of these toxins and keeping products from being adulterated by them must be of top priority, especially as the threat of chemical and microbiological contaminants grows.

In drawing on the scientific expertise of the FDA and NAS in the development of these standards, my legislation will likewise draw on the experience and expertise of the Agriculture Department for carrying out a comprehensive seafood inspection effort. USDA has a demonstrated and proven capacity to meet the challenge of keeping our food supply the most wholesome and secure in the world, and it is the strength of this infrastructure upon which this program will rest.

I also want to comment on another piece of legislation which will be introduced today on this same subject that I am also going to support. Today my good friend and respected chairman, the chairman of the Agriculture Committee, Mr. DE LA GARZA, will introduce a bill which will require the same comprehensive system of fish inspection. His is a tough and fair piece of legislation, which I am pleased to support and will work with him to enact. We have minor differences of opinion which I am confident we, and the rest of us in this House with an interest in this issue, can resolve as we move through the legislative process. As we go through that process, however, I believe it important to have under active consideration the approach I am advocating and am taking with my bill.

Mr. Speaker, all of us are concerned about food safety. We have the best food supply in the world, let us keep it that way and assure all Americans of its wholesomeness. This legislation will do that and I am confident with the committed effort of the House and with compromise, we can have in place by the end of this Congress a program to protect American consumers from adulterated fish and seafood.

SUMMARY—THE CONSUMER SEAFOOD SAFETY ACT OF 1989

1. Applies to vessels and to establishments.

2. Applies to all stages of processing from harvesting to packing and transportation.

3. Authority is with Secretary of Agriculture unless otherwise indicated.

ANNUNZIO LAUDS CHICAGO CUBS ON WINNING NATIONAL LEAGUE EAST TITLE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, the Chicago Cubs, once the doormat of the National League, have clinched the championship of the National League East, and will open the playoffs at Wrigley Field next Wednesday night against the San Francisco Giants. There has always been a nationwide passion for the Cubs, perhaps because they play baseball the old-fashioned way. But now there is a Cubs' fever in Chicago. And nowhere is it more fervent than in my 11th District—the heartland of Cubs' territory.

The Cubs were given little chance at the start of the 1989 baseball season. The club went 77–85 last year, stumbled to a 9–23 spring training record, and then suffered numerous injuries in the early going. The fantastic Cubs then streaked to a 90–66 season, and became the first team, on Tuesday night, to clinch a spot in the playoffs—their second National League title in six seasons.

Earlier, I mentioned they reached their lofty perch in the playoffs by overcoming injuries to key players. In May, Andre Dawson, Jerome Walton, and Mitch Webster went on the disabled list within a span of 5 days. Dwight Smith, Lloyd McClendon, and Doug Dascenzo were brought up from the minors and did the job. So did rookie catcher Joe Girardi after Damon Berryhill was lost for the season in late August.

And it was fitting that Ryne Sandberg, the only everyday player from the Cubs' last title team in 1984, scored the go-ahead run in the title clincher.

Mr. Speaker, one cannot say enough about the job done by Don Zimmer, surely an odds-on favorite to be named National League Manager of the Year. In winning, the Cubs made Zimmer, Chicago's eighth manager in the 1980's, a champion for the first time in 11 seasons.

The fans of Chicago, especially in my district, and across the country, cheer the Cubs who have not been in the World Series since 1945, and have not won it since 1908.

This may be the year for the Chicago Cubs.

THE NEED TO RESTORE ECONOMIC PROSPERITY IN RURAL COMMUNITIES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALLON] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. TALLON. Mr. Speaker, the rural areas of our Nation have not been a part of the economic recovery of the 1980's. In fact, many communities in the heartland of this country and in the extremely rural areas of many areas are losing population.

They are losing population to the Nation's urban centers and the reasons are numerous.

First, young people completing their education cannot find opportunities for employment in their rural hometowns.

Second, the small family farmer can no longer make it in agriculture without outside employment, and those jobs are becoming harder and harder to find.

Third, small businesses in rural areas are closing up shop.

They simply can't compete for capital and market share. And, businesses are not moving into rural areas, partly because of infrastructure deficiencies and partly because it's cheaper for businesses to take their operations overseas, where they can exploit the availability of lower costs and cheaper labor.

If this trend in rural America continues, Mr. Speaker, we're going to have some parts of the country where we'll have to ask the last one to leave to please turn out the lights.

That would be highly undesirable.

It is undesirable because our cities are already overburdened.

It is undesirable because when some people leave the community, the businesses and essential services are weakened. Let me cite but one example. When people emigrate from a small rural area, that means there are that many fewer people for the local hospital to draw from, and so, the hospital gets into financial trouble and closes. And with that closing go a number of jobs, and when those jobs are gone, the people who had them have to look elsewhere—and elsewhere is an urban area where there is more opportunity.

Not only does this cycle create an overburden for the urban center, it intensifies the deterioration of the rural areas.

And so, Mr. Speaker, in order to preserve those rural areas, in order to pursue the prudent policy of having our population spread all over the land rather than concentrated in a few congested locations—in order to accomplish these things, we must concentrate our time and attention on economic development in rural areas.

Today, I am introducing legislation that would begin to accomplish just that. I am introducing the Rural Revitalization Act, which will address some of the problems facing rural areas.

Let me describe for a moment some of those problems.

In extensive hearings conducted by the Subcommittee on Conservation, Credit and Rural Development, we heard a continuing refrain: Rural communities are capital poor and the infrastructure is not adequate to support many business activities.

Let me use my home district in South Carolina as a prime example of what I am describing. We have a surplus labor force, lower taxes, an availability of cheap land and plenty of natural resources.

What we don't have is the lifeline for any economic development, water, and sewer services.

That problem is not unique to my district, for I could cite example after example of rural areas suffering the same conditions.

The legislation I introduce today would address some of these problems. In the area of water and sewer funding, this bill would provide $95 million in increased funding for the Farmers Home Administration, $94 million for the rural electric cooperatives to bring water and sewer facilities to communities where they don't exist now. As well, the legislation would provide the authority for the Farm Credit system to make water and sewer loans.

These three steps will begin to make it possible for our rural communities to improve their water and wastewater treatment facilities to the degree that they can support increased business activity.

Equally important, Mr. Speaker, this legislation will make it possible for rural communities to meet increasingly stringent water quality standards to come into compliance with existing law. Without the kind of assistance provided in my legislation, many of our rural communities simply cannot achieve compliance.

A second obstacle to rural economic development is the lack of technical assistance. Many a good idea for a new rural business or for the expansion of existing businesses is stopped in its tracks because the entrepreneur just does not have access to the kind of technical assistance that would help him make the next step.

For example, a successful small rural entrepreneurial venture may be capable of achieving market share outside the community. But, the entrepreneur simply doesn't have the time, the marketing expertise, or the ability to buy it, and so any hope of expansion is stopped dead in its tracks.

My legislation provides for a nation "rural development" hotline through the National Agricultural Library where individuals and businesses can acquire this much-needed technical assistance. It also provides for areawide strategic planning assistance and for technical small business assistance through the rural electric cooperatives.

The availability of capital is an additional impediment to rural development. For a variety of reasons, rural enterprise looks like risky business to the banking community. It is not unusual to have a small rural borrower be told by the big city bank to go home and figure out how to borrow more because they don't want to be troubled with servicing the kinds of small loans that rural enterprises require.

And so, my legislation provides $300 million to the U.S. Department of Agriculture for revolving loan funds in risk capital to emerging small businesses. This would be administered over 3 years through nonprofit organizations, rural cooperatives, investor owned utilities, chambers of commerce, and State and local governments.

These revolving loan funds would be leveraged to the maximum, so that the funds from the revolving funds would be matched by local funds, including loan funds from local banks, to achieve the most development out of the fewest Federal dollars.

This is a partnership program. It involves the Federal Government's providing a helping hand—not a hand out—to complete a vital link in the circle.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to express my grateful appreciation for the insight and support of my 108 colleagues who have agreed to be cosponsors for the Rural Revitalization Act. These Members come from all over this great Nation, and they represent diverse population, urban as well as rural.

I am indeed gratified that so many of my colleagues understand the importance of restoring economic prosperity in the Nation's rural areas.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of the Rural Revitalization Act, of which I am an original cosponsor, which was introduced today by my friend and colleague Mr. TALLON of South Carolina.

Mr. Speaker, It's an ironic development that almost every poll I've seen in recent years shows that the great majority of Americans prefer to live in rural areas, yet, more than three-quarters of our national population is concentrated in the cities.

There's a reason for this, and the Rural Revitalization Act gets right to the heart of the matter. The reason most people live in cities is that there are not the same opportunities for employment in rural America, and many of the services those in urban areas take for granted, are just not available.

The central issue here is quite simple, it is quality of life. What is the quality of lifestyle that rural citizens deserve? Do they deserve the same access to adequate health care, a good education, communication technology, and business opportunities?

This, Mr. Speaker, is the question that the Rural Revitalization Act attempts to answer. In our consideration of rural issues in the Agriculture Committee we came face to face with our Nation's need for the construction of water and sewer systems, and the need for technical assistance in business development. There is no question that it is in the best interest of our Nation to provide these services to make rural America competitive. In addition, rural America has the abundant resources required to spur trade in value added, more refined, products around the world.

I believe this legislation shows the good sense, the forward planning that is needed to proceed with the revitalization of our rural areas. Any economic development is ultimately local in nature. If it isn't, it is unlikely to be effective. I have heard a great deal about the budget constraints this Congress operates under, but Mr. Speaker, the time is right, to reinfuse capital and economic life into rural areas. This bill has outlined specific strategies in technology and basic services in rural America, in such areas as water and sewer construction.

Mr. Speaker, the Rural Revitalization Act is a budget conscious bill. It has budget restraint. This bill allows local entities, such as local governments, electric cooperatives, and nonprofit organizations, as well as investor owned utilities to play a role in developing their own areas and communities. Finally Mr. Speaker, we realize that rural development is diverse, it means different things to different regions of our Nation and different people. This bill recognizes this diversity and accepts the challenge it poses by providing for more flexibility and local input. We recognize that rural development in Alabama and Mississippi may be different than Oregon or Nevada. Mr. Speaker, this bill puts the Congress on record, as being committed to rural development.

The Rural Revitalization Act is this body's first attempt in this session to keep its promise and bring the economic expansion of the eighties to small town America, I encourage my colleagues to step forth with enthusiasm and give rural America the boost it deserves.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join Mr. TALLON in cosponsoring the Rural Revitalization Act. This legislation is exactly the catalyst needed for many rural areas to proceed with the rebuilding of their communities and towns. This legislation offers hope that there are viable, concrete means, and methods in which rural Americans can bring about brighter futures for themselves and for their future generations, without having to leave their communities and towns.

In the 3 years that I have been in Congress, I have seen struggling communities—not just in my own State of South Dakota, but in others across the Nation—which, despite their best plans and best-intentioned hopes, have failed at revitalization efforts simply because they lacked the means and the technical know-how needed to develop basic, adequate water, and sewer facilities. No matter how beautiful and inexpensive your land is, or how much of an able-bodied, willing work force you have, or how magnanimous your tax incentives—if a developing or expanding business cannot get clean water and adequate wastewater treatment facilities from your community, then there's no deal.

Dozens of small towns and communities in the rural State of South Dakota that I am privileged to represent, have had these same obstacles and hurdles which they could not overcome.

I have watched rural area residents leaving for the big cities, in droves, for a number of years and I think it's high time to stem this tide. Certainly, these people are leaving not because they don't like the State or their hometowns, but they leave primarily because there is very little in the way of opportunity to look forward to for the future. The towns are deteriorating, and there is little hope for revitalization.

How ironic it is that in this day of advanced technological wonders and achievements, many rural towns across the Nation and particularly a number in my home State, do not have water that is clean by city standards, nor do they have the adequate sewage treatment facilities that we here in the big city take for granted.

I am particularly pleased that the Rural Revitalization Act will address this issue by enabling the rural electric cooperatives—the people who already live and work in rural America, the people who are familiar with utility operations and, more importantly, the people who care about the quality of life in rural America—to play a significant role in bringing in water and sewer facilities to these communities.

I have had the opportunity to work with the REA and with the folks at the rural electric cooperatives in South Dakota in the years that I have represented South Dakota in the State legislature and now in Congress, and I am confident that the rural electric systems can tackle this new undertaking with the same determination and will to succeed as they displayed in bringing reliable, affordable electric power to rural Americans across the country.

This very weekend in South Dakota, I will be hosting my colleague from New York, GEORGE HOCHBRUECKNER, for the biennial "Congress to the Country" program sponsored by the Sioux Valley Empire Electric Cooperative. Through this long-running and very successful effort, Members of Congress from various parts of the country—especially Members who represent urban areas—have the opportunity to see first-hand what rural electric cooperatives mean to the lives of America's farmers, ranchers, and small town residents.

I urge my colleagues in the House who have not yet expressed their support for Representative TALLON's legislation to speak up, and to join us in securing passage of this important initiative. Enactment of the Rural Revitalization Act will help to improve the lives of many millions of our friends and relatives living in rural America.

Mr. GRANDY. Mr. Speaker, I share the sentiments of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALLON]. As you may know, Iowa is one of those States in which a number of areas are reporting population losses. My district experienced a population loss of about 1 percent between 1970 and 1980, and I wouldn't be surprised if that percentage is increasing.

Part of this is because of the decline of the family farm, but a lot of it has to do with the fact that young people just out of school come home and can't find anything to do.

And so, they go off to Chicago and St. Louis and Des Moines, where there is a better prospect of well-paid employment.

Their gain is rural America's loss, and, Mr. Speaker, I would say today that the problem is becoming more than important, it is approaching critical.

The rural population is aging. About 25 percent of the rural population is of retirement age. These are the people who have served on the county commissions, as mayors of their communities, as elders in the churches, on the school boards.

They are wise, and canny, and devoted to their communities. But a lot of them think it's time for them to step down. But they can't.

There's no one to succeed them. We're losing a whole generation of rural youths.

Let me tell you what we're giving up. We're giving up energy and good ideas. We're giving up the restless enthusiasm of our youthful population, the kind of youthful persistence that will ultimately get the bucket filled, even if we have to do it a teaspoon at a time.

The United Negro College Fund has a motto, a very good motto: "A Mind is a Terrible Thing to Waste."

Unless we begin the revitalization of our rural areas, unless we bring modern telecommunication facilities, modern water and wastewater treatment, jobs and capital, to our rural communities, we are about to waste, for rural America, a whole generation of minds.

And that is a terrible thing.

The legislation we discuss today will help to begin that process. And I should emphasize process. Rome wasn't built in a day, and rural America won't be revitalized in a day, or a week, or a year, or maybe 5 years.

The Rural Revitalization Act is a very, important beginning to that process, but I want to emphasize that it is but the beginning, and when the legislative effect of this act is completed, the process must continue.

I think it will, and the reason is fairly simple.

What we are doing with the rural revitalization is laying some groundwork, providing some help and some capital for economic development to begin in rural America.

I think this will have just the opposite effect of what we have seen in rural areas in recent years, the spiral of economic decline, the cycle in which the implement store closes and two people are out of jobs, and they can't farm and make a living. So they shut down the farm, sell it off, and move to town, and so the grocery store loses a couple of customers, and things get a little tighter, and on we go.

I can imagine a very different scenario as a result of the legislation we are considering today, a scenario in which our local rural communities—and I want to emphasize that word local—create a job here, a job there, two jobs here, and three jobs there, and do it a thousand times over.

For there to be a solid, sustained rural economic recovery, the initiative must be local, and the development efforts must be locally administered. This legislation provides for local administration.

In the Rural Revitalization Act, we have also acknowledged that the Federal Government has a role in rural economic development, and we have scaled that role, in terms of both technical assistance and funding, appropriately.

I am delighted and honored to speak on behalf of this legislation. I would commend the gentleman from South Carolina for his insight and sensitivity to the problems of our rural areas, and pledge my wholehearted efforts on behalf of this legislation.

Thank you.

SENATE—Thursday, September 28, 1989

(Legislative day of Monday, September 18, 1989)

The Senate met at 9:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable HERBERT KOHL, a Senator from the State of Wisconsin.

PRAYER

The Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

For thus saith the Lord God, the Holy One of Israel: In returning and rest shall ye be saved: in quietness and in confidence shall be your strength.—Isaiah 30:15.

Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.—Matthew 11:15.

Gracious Father in Heaven, thank Thee for the invitation to rest. We are grateful for physical and mental renewal, but often our spirits are weary in ways that do not yield to conventional rest. Sometimes, hard work on the part of Senators and staff do not produce the desired end, with resulting frustration.

Objective by nature, elected officials know how to accept defeat when they do not prevail in debate; in spite of which the experience is spiritually enervating. Benevolent Lord, grant to Thy servants, laboring under the urgent necessity of the fiscal deadline, relief from tension. Teach them the wisdom of godly rest, available, however busy or distracted. Help Thy servants to seek rest for their souls by turning to Thee midst pressures.

We pray this in His name who was never in a hurry yet finished His work against overwhelming odds. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, DC, September 28, 1989.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable HERBERT KOHL, a Senator from the State of Wisconsin, to perform the duties of the Chair.

ROBERT C. BYRD,
President pro tempore.

Mr. KOHL thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the standing order, the majority leader is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approached to date.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, following the time for the two leaders, there will be a period for morning business until 10 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each.

At 10 this morning there will be a rollcall vote on Specter amendment No. 882 to the Department of Defense appropriations bill. Other votes relative to the DOD bill are expected throughout the day.

Shortly, I will seek unanimous consent to turn to the continuing resolution immediately following the vote on the Specter amendment, and then to proceed to the VA-HUD appropriations bill. We will then return to the DOD bill, complete that one, and then it is my hope and expectation that we will be able to go to the State-Justice-Commerce appropriations bill, which is the last of the appropriations bills.

Senators should be prepared for rollcall votes throughout the day and a session into the evening as we attempt to complete action on all of these matters today if at all possible.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my leader time, and I reserve the time for the distinguished Republican leader.

MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 10 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not to exceed 5 minutes each.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATCH addressed the Chair.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah.

CHANGES IN REFUGEE ADMISSIONS

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the State Department has proposed drastic changes in its long-standing policy on refugee admissions from the Soviet Union. This policy change may, in effect, prevent thousands of individuals who live under the constant threat and fear of persecution because of their race and religious beliefs from emigrating to the United States. The State Department claims the new policy is based on budget reality. Such a policy change, I feel, is based on mistaken premises and is ill-timed, as it comes during a period of great instability and uncertainty in the Soviet Union. As a democratic people we should not shut our doors to those who have suffered and been persecuted.

For the past two decades, the United States has demanded that Moscow allow those citizens who wish to emigrate to freedom to do so. We have pressed the Soviets to live up to their responsibilities as a world power and to start respecting the basic premises of human rights. Moreover, we have sought to leverage Soviet emigration by linking trade and credit to emigration performance through the Jackson-Vanik amendment (section 402, Trade Act of 1974). This amendment prohibits granting most-favored-nation [MFN] status or trade credits to any nonmarket country that denies its citizens the right and opportunity to emigrate as they choose.

Throughout this period marked by sharp rises and falls in Soviet emigration numbers, the United States has remained steadfast in efforts to give Soviet emigres the freedom to determine where they choose to live. In the face of repeated suggestions by some to funnel Soviet Jews to Israel, the United States' response has been that Soviet emigrants must have the freedom of choice.

Until September 1988, Soviet Jews were almost automatically assumed to be refugees. Lawyers at the State Department and the Justice Department, however, concluded last year that such an assumption was improper. They insisted that Soviet applicants be more closely reviewed to see if they could demonstrate that they are victims of persecution or have a well-founded fear of persecution.

After applying moral pressure, stressing human rights, and promoting freedom throughout the world, the State Department has decided to continue this policy of turning its back on some who want to share the American dream that we expressly advocate. Where we once had an open door for peoples fleeing the tyranny and oppression of Communist regimes, we are battening down the hatches. So long as the Soviet Government refused to let these individuals leave, or jailed them for asking to go, or kept them waiting for a visa, made them dissidents and refuseniks, the U.S. Government considered them persecuted. It automatically offered refugee status under those circumstances.

Now, due to Mikhail Gorbachev's move toward openness and restructuring, and perhaps somewhat influenced by our moral suasion and humanitarian appeals, the Soviets are granting exit visas by the thousands. Yet the conditions in the Soviet Union remain bleak. The inability to practice and teach religion openly in the Soviet Union remains a reality. Discrimination in employment and education continue, and restrictions on cultural and literary expression remain relatively unchanged. In short, persecution remains unabated.

Recent tentative liberalizations have magnified political instabilities in the Soviet system. Most visible are the nationalities problems. Demands for independence and autonomy are serious problems without visible solutions. The failure to control this situation could exacerbate ideological divisions in the Soviet leadership and provoke a return to more hard-line policies.

Where does this leave Soviet Jews and other religious minorities who already face persecution and harassment in their efforts to practice and express their religious beliefs? Soviet Jews are subject to virulent anti-Semitic sentiments by grassroots organizations, such as Pamyat (Memory), an organization in that particular category. The new policy of openness, combined with emerging forms of extremist Russian nationalism, has liberated latent Russian anti-Semitism. If perestroika fails, Soviet Jews and other religious minorities may well face increased repression and violence.

Let us not forget the Soviet Union is far from being a free and open democratic society where freedom of choice, freedom of religion, and freedom of speech are the norm rather than the exception. Also, let us not forget the lessons history has taught us about reform in the Soviet Union. Time and again, periods of reform and liberalization have been followed by some of the most brutal and repressive crackdowns.

I can understand the need to enhance the screening process in light of the recent influx of refugee applications. But we must remember a few basic considerations. First, many of these individuals take for granted the anti-Semitic burdens they face. In many ways they have learned to live under these harsh conditions, and they assume the immigration officers understand this. Second, think of the courage it takes for these individuals to walk into the U.S. Embassy. They are anxious and afraid and may be reluctant to detail their claims of persecution while knowing that they must return to Soviet soil under the rule of these authorities. To subject these individuals to an arbitrary process and to place the burden of proof on these individuals under these conditions flies in the face of this country's refugee policy. These people are deemed persecuted just by nature of the fact that they belong to a clearly persecuted group.

Under the current State Department plan, not every Soviet Jew seeking entry into the United States is assured the opportunity to be admitted as a refugee. At least half of the applicants would fall under the category known as priority six, the lowest level in the U.S. ranking system. What do we do with these people? What if it disqualifies some of the leaders of the Soviet emigration movement? Was our traditional open-door policy toward anyone fleeing communism mere rhetoric? Now that the numbers are increasing, are we going to give up our fight against persecution and our advocacy of a better way of life?

To cope with the new challenges, American Jewish agencies are mobilizing all their forces. They are expanding the sizes of their staffs and raising funds to help settle the growing numbers. But another significant change contemplated by the State Department would gradually end the use of Rome and Vienna as way-stations for Jews leaving the Soviet Union and would cause all determinations of refugee status to be conducted in the Soviet Union. This action would cut the nonprofit organizations from direct access to the emigration process and obstruct their abilities in the area of resettlement. They would be seriously hindered in determining the needs of would-be refugees, how best to help them, and where to resettle them. What are the implications?

I believe the United States has an obligation to admit refugees into our country to escape persecution and to begin a life of religious freedom. I personally have been involved in adopting and assisting several Soviet Jewish families in their emigration efforts, and I plan to continue to fight for these people who have endured and continue to endure persecution in many ways that many of us do not always consider. Persecution includes blatant brutality, torture, and other forms of physical violence, but many of us overlook that fact that persecution includes the inability to practice and become educated in one's cultural and religious beliefs as well. As a nation committed to and founded upon the ideals of freedom, the United States should not justifiably turn its back to those who are eagerly seeking rights that we advocate and uphold.

Mr. President, let me add in closing. I remember through history, having watched it through innumerable newsclips and having lived through that period of time that shortly before the Second World War and throughout that whole period of time German Jews just were unable to really go anywhere and frankly, 6 million just suffered death because we were unwilling to open our doors and to help them, not just the United States but all of the free countries in the world.

I do not want that to happen again. In our zeal to be happy about perestroika and glasnost, I do not think we should be penny-wise and pound-foolish here. These people are still persecuted under the present regime, and if perestroika and glasnost falls they will be persecuted under the future regimes.

Mr. ADAMS addressed the Chair.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Washington [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. ADAMS pertaining to the introduction of Senate Joint Resolution 209 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

CUTTING THE TAX RATE ON CAPITAL GAINS

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, very soon, all eyes will be focused on the House of Representatives, and the scheduled vote to cut the tax rate on capital gains.

At the moment, we do not know precisely how the votes line up—it is reported to be close.

But I can speak with a little more certainty on the larger issue at stake here. A capital gains cut is bad enough on its face—but it could prove even more damaging if it serves as a dinner bell, calling every tax lobbyist in town to the table. If a capital gains cut is accomplished, the ringing call will go out to K Street—"come and get it."

The special interests will be back in business.

In 1986, Congress passed an historic reordering of our tax policy. We made a deal. On one side, we would bring down tax rates, on the other side, we would close loopholes. We would take the high-priced lawyers and creative accountants out of the equation, and put everyone on a level playing field.

It was a good compromise. It was never the most politically appealing issue, but most good compromises never are. Apparently, however, our ability to resist the temptation of tampering with the tax code is about to end. And once the code is cracked for one special interest provision—in this case, to benefit America's wealthiest few—then we'll be trampled by a stampeed of cats and dogs.

Every loophole we were able to chase out of the Tax Code will be back at the door.

And for what? What is the enormous emergency that makes it necessary to threaten the delicate balance struck in 1986?

Is a half-backed, hocus-pocus, hit and run giveaway to the ultrarich. The capital gains cut will result in a huge taxpayer subsidy for "The lifestyles of the rich and famous."

This temporary cut in capital gains rates would encourage wealthy investors to cash in their chips now, during a window of opportunity.

Obviously, more revenues will be collected by the Government while the fire sale is under way. And that will look good on the Government books—while the selling frenzy lasts. But what about the future?

What about those revenues we would have collected over time? Those revenues will be gone—lost. a stimulation of the economy. It is a simple raiding of our own future revenues.

Mr. President, when will we find it within ourselves to resist passing the buck on to our children and grandchildren? We can not continue to defer on the tough questions. We simply cannot have it all—and the capital gains cut is a good place to start saying no.

Now, I do not argue that the Tax Code is sacred, Mr. President. It is far from perfect. But all too often, tax amendments tend to benefit a well-connected few. That is certainly the case with the capital gains cut.

But for once, we are being offered an alternative. The proposal sponsored by the chairman of the Finance Committee is a refreshing departure from the status quo.

The IRA proposal will restore a savings incentive to middle-income families. It will help those families educate their children, or buy a first home. It is as different from the capital gains cut as night and day. Seventy percent of the IRA benefits would go to the savings accounts of families with incomes under $100,000. Eighty percent of the capital gains benefit will fall into the pockets of Americans making over $200,000 a year.

Let us look at the folly of the administration's own capital gains cut proposal. After a brief surge in revenues brought on by a selling spree, the bottom falls out.

In the years 1991-99, we lose $71 billion. Mr. President, the last time I checked the deficit numbers around here, we did not have $71 billion to lose.

That is more than the entire Stealth Bomber Program. It is money that we need to spend on the war on drugs, or on child care, or on health care, or to educate our kids.

Mr. President, our country cannot afford a capital gains cut. The average American cannot afford a capital gains cut. For your average taxpayer, the prospects are lose-lose. For the rich, it is a win-win scenario.

Capital gains are the single largest source of income for the very rich. Altogether, profits from selling stocks and bonds and real estate account for more than a third of the income of people making more than $200,000. Again, an incredible 80 percent of all capital gains go to the richest 5 percent of the population.

Mr. President, those are the only people who stand to gain here. The vast majority of taxpayers have no capital gains at all. For the 4 out of 5 families earning $50,000 a year or less, the average tax savings from the Jenkins plan is about 15 bucks.

That is the real difference here. Fifteen bucks versus unlimited gains and discount tax rates for the rich. What we are really talking about, Mr. President, is caviar for the haves and peanuts for the have-nots. Money for Jaguars and Rolls Royces and bigger and more plush yachts for those who need tax relief the least.

To those families in America struggling to make ends meet—to pay the doctor's bill, to meet the mortgage payment, to send their son or daughter to college, to pay the higher and higher grocery bills, there is not a penny—not one single penny for those who own no stocks, no bonds, no real estate. For shame! How can our President and those in Congress who would cut the capital gains tax face the people of this country with heartless and unfair proposals.

The average $15 that the average family will save under the Jenkins plan could buy a large pizza with four toppings. With the windfall of the capital gains cut, the wealthy can dine in a restaurant with four stars every night for 4 years.

The average American will save enough to pay a parking ticket. Wealthy Americans will save enough to buy a parking garage.

Mr. President, the only business that will benefit from the capital gains cut is the tax shelter business. We will see the return of all kinds of creative gimmicks to convert ordinary taxable income into capital gains. It is a license to abuse the Tax Code, and we will not be able to stop it.

And we will not be able to stop the flood of special interest amendments to the Tax Code, either. I have been around here long enough to know that once we start down that road, we will never get back to where we started.

Mr. President, we made our deal in 1986. If we renege on capital gains, the sky is the limit. Let us keep the lobbyists and the lawyers and the accountants out of it. But more importantly, let us keep the promise we made to the American people.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Kansas.

EDUCATION: OUR RESPONSIBILITY

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, yesterday, President Bush and the Nation's Governors began their 2-day education summit—only the third meeting of its kind in the history of the country. The summit provides an important and needed focus on education and the critical role it plays in the vitality of our Nation.

The stakes are high. Our productivity and ability to compete in a sophisticated international market relies upon a skilled and flexible work force. The continued vitality of democratic government relies on the active participation of an informed citizenry.

Unfortunately, somewhere along the line, we seem to have lost our sense of direction. We maintain a strong faith in education. At the same time, there is increasing concern that the system for delivering education is letting us down.

We should perhaps consider that we are all a part of that system and that we are letting it down. One of the major themes emerging from the summit is accountability. The other side of the accountability coin is the personal responsibility each of us holds for assuring excellence.

The true test of the success of the summit will lie not so much in the papers or recommendations it produces as in its capacity to renew our commitment. Our vision for education may be national in scope, but its delivery rests squarely in our hands at the local level.

I hope that the summit will stimulate action on the local level to consider specific educational goals and the role that each individual has to play in accomplishing them. National goals are important, but they must be defined in a way which makes sense for a local community. Division of responsibility is not merely sorting out the respective obligation of Federal, State, and local regulations and funding sources—but also the obligations of parents, students, teachers, administrators, school board members, and business leaders.

Our school system is perhaps one of the most democratic institutions in our country. As our Nation has grown more urban and the scope of government expanded, the number of individuals and institutions layered between citizens and final decisionmakers has simply exploded. Sadly, this has created a sense of frustration and impotency which causes individuals to question whether any one person can really accomplish anything.

The point we must emphasize is that the local school is one place where enormous power and autonomy remains at the local level. Decisions about what our children will study, who will teach them, and what additional programs and services will be available are made at the local level. For the most part, these are not directives handed to local schools by anonymous bureaucrats miles away.

Our schools are places where it is still possible to deal face-to-face on a routine basis with policy setters and decisionmakers. Information, which is key to sound decisions, is far more accessible. Schools rely heavily on local funding sources, giving the community a powerful tool to assure accountability. School board members are elected by people who know them personally.

In short, individuals at the local level have a broad range of means directly available to them for influencing the quality of their schools. There is no need to wait for a Federal grant to launch innovative ideas. Communities which identify a need to establish after school programs to offer supervision for latchkey children can do so, and many have. Many other schools have not awaited a national directive or commission to develop programs where children can be made more aware of the needs of their own communities through service opportunities.

Local schools can also define their educational goals and establish specific measurable outcomes to assess progress in areas of particular importance to the school and community. For example, the broad goal of fostering good citizenship could be broken down into specific targets—such as having a given percentage of 18-year-old seniors who are registered to vote, seeking to achieve a given number of hours in student community service projects, or setting a target pass rate on a test of basic constitutional principles.

A school with a high proportion of at-risk students might choose a different set of goals related to educational quality—things like reducing the dropout or absenteeism rate by 5 percent per year or increasing the percentage of parents who attend parent-teacher conferences. Instituting such measures at the local level offers the advantage not only of reflecting community needs and priorities but also offers stronger opportunities for accountability. By having a specific target, a community can focus resources and determine whether or not the measures they have selected are effective.

In charting the path toward these goals, it is important to maintain a rational division of labor. Schools cannot be expected to singlehandedly address every societal problem which finds its way into the classroom.

School boards and school administrators need to work together, with the board establishing overall policy without dealing with the day-to-day management of the schools. Teachers must be able to teach without constant interruptions of class periods, and parents need to once again become involved in the education of their children.

I think perhaps one of the most distressing trends of recent years is the decline in parental involvement in education. Ultimately, it is the parent who can motivate a child to do well in school and the parent who can determine how well that school is performing.

There are few other areas in which one individual can have such an enormous impact. Those of us in Washington have the power to pass billion dollar programs and launch national initiatives, but we are totally powerless in creating those caring, committed individuals on whom every success depends. We cannot legislate or manufacture such people; we can only hope they rise from among us.

Columnist Robert J. Samuelson perhaps summed it up best in noting:

> What's most needed to improve U.S. education is a sense of purpose * * * school policies ultimately reflect popular attitudes. Improvements will come if the political climate exists for them. * * * We will get quality schools only if students and parents are willing to work for them. It's as simple and difficult as that.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. I am required to report and will advise Senators that morning business is scheduled to conclude at 10 o'clock and we will vote on the pending business.

The Senator from Illinois.

EXTENSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time for morning business be extended to 10:15 a.m. with Senators permitted to speak for up to 2 minutes each, and that at 10:15 the vote occur on the Specter amendment No. 882.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, I believe there are five of us who wish 2 minutes each. Could we amend that to 10:10? I know of Senators who plan to be here and had other business.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator amend the request?

Mr. DIXON. The Senator has no objection to that. I am advised by the distinguished President pro tempore he needs about 5 minutes. I am trying to accommodate all colleagues I see on the floor here. I think 10:15 would be about right if my colleague would yield to that.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SPECTER. No objection, five times two plus five that is it.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Alaska is recognized.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. MURKOWSKI pertaining to the introduction of S. 1684 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Illinois.

BUTCH McGUIRE OF CHICAGO

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, on November 18, 1989, Butch McGuire will be honored by his friends for his continued dedication to the city of Chicago. This salute will benefit the cardiology programs at Northwestern Memorial Hospital.

Twenty-eight years ago, Butch opened a saloon at 20 West Division Street on Chicago's near North Side. Since that time, Butch McGuire's has become a landmark, renowned throughout the United States as a place where people, no matter where they come from, can feel at home in Chicago. Butch McGuire's has obtained this reputation because of the man behind the name.

In addition to supplying Chicago with a great place of entertainment, Butch McGuire has been active in numerous charitable organizations, many of which he has headed over the years.

Butch will be forever remembered for his hard work and determination in making Santa Claus Anonymous, a program designed to distribute Christmas cheer to underprivileged children throughout the Chicago area, the success that it is today. He has also been actively involved in the Chicago chapter of the American Ireland Fund and the Heart Foundation, to name a few.

Butch can be proud of his many accomplishments and we thank him for his seemingly never-ending dedication to Chicago and its citizens.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Washington.

Mr. GORTON. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. GORTON pertaining to the introduction of Senate Joint Resolution 209 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I commend my colleague on the statement.

THE BUYING OF AMERICA

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, every month we focus on the trade figures, the deficits between America and our foreign trading partners in merchandise and in services. The figures are precise, the trend lines charted, and attempts to correct it a matter of deep interest to all Senators. The omnibus trade bill which passed last year addressed this issue and, among other things, set into motion a process, known as Super 301 dealing with unfair trading practices by other nations. Less well understood, with no reliable regular data, is the steady acquisition of American companies by citizens and companies of other nations, particularly Japan. The last administration successfully fought off even the most modest attempts of Congress to get regular data about this practice, and without data it is impossible to evaluate the specific impact of such purchases of valuable American assets.

Yesterday, Mr. President, the latest of such acquisitions was widely publicized. A venerable American institution, Columbia Pictures, whose logo is reminiscent of our Statue of Liberty, was bought for cash by a Japanese company, Sony Corp. The Japanese just walked in with $3.4 billion in cash and walked out with Columbia Pictures. It is a familiar story in the entertainment business, as in the hotel business, and in a host of other businesses and industries. The U.S. entertainment business is one of the crown jewels of American industry. It is a business in which U.S. supremacy has been unchallenged. Everybody in the world watches American movies—most everybody—and films. Columbia Pictures is the third of seven Hollywood studios to go abroad. Two weeks ago MGM was sold to an Australian concern, and 20th Century Fox was also sold to an Australian company. A fourth company, Warner Communications, as well as Paramount Communications are rumored "takeover" candidates.

I do not mean to imply some diabolical plot to tailor movies and whatever messages they send to American audiences by a sinister foreign cabal. But these assets are now being bought on the cheap, because the dollar is low in order to allow us to compete more effectively in the global market. My concern is that by the time the dollar's devaluation has the effect of making us once again truly competitive and our trade balances get back into the black ink, America will no longer own the crown jewels of our economy.

There are some controls over the acquisition of American companies in some sectors, but they are sporadic, without real rationality. The Congress does not even have the basic data to make judgments about the ownership of our economy: where the dangers of foreign ownership are, where the benefits are, how we control the mix, and what kinds of measures we should be taking when things have gone too far in one industry or another.

A specific case in point is the airline industry. Airlines are being acquired by investors on speculation, carrying very large debt, in so-called leveraged-buyouts. Airlines, however, do have some regulatory framework, but it is vague and needs to be sorted out with the American national interest in mind. The Senate has recently had a bruising fight over the FSX issue, the transfer of technology from another crown jewel, our aerospace industry, to the Japanese, who are clearly bent on building a world class aerospace industry and competing directly with us. Foreign airlines are being used to provide up-front cash in the buy-outs of U.S. carriers. For instance, an investor group recently bought Northwest Airlines and most of the up-front cash was put up by a Dutch airline, KLM. As well, United Airlines, is being acquired by an employee-management group, with most of the up-front cash, or equity, provided by British Airways. How do we differentiate among these acquisitions? Which ones are good, which should be curtailed, which should be encouraged?

In the case of our airlines, the law requires that no more than 25 percent of the ownership of an airline be foreign. The legal definition of "ownership" regarding airlines is in terms of "voting interest." The Department of Transportation has recently engaged in some creative freelancing regarding the definition of ownership and has been pressuring those investors who would acquire an airline on the matter of safety and ownership. The issue is complicated because some ownership is acquired by cash, some is acquired by debt, and in the case of United, some is acquired by labor concessions. A very welcome and healthy development, in my judgment, is the acquisition of United Airlines by the employees of that airline, in particular the airline pilots. They are purchasing about three-fourths of the carrier by putting their livelihood and future earnings on the line in order to control their company. For these purposes, an employee stock ownership plan has been created. In the process the long-term future of the company is virtually guaranteed to remain a truly American asset. When this acquisition is closed, in about 3 weeks, United Airlines will be the largest employee-owned company in our Nation's history. I strongly support his development, based on my own knowledge of the very positive experience of Weirton Steel in West Virginia. I am personally, intimately acquainted with this major success story of employee ownership.

I would certainly think that the concerns that we all have over airline safety will be attended to assiduously by the employees, who are the owners of an airline, and I take more comfort in this prospect than placing the safety of our passengers in the hands of an investor group which just wants to turn a quick profit. I cannot think of any arrangement that would do more to foster airline safety than the joining of management and labor as owners. We are all aware of numerous instances of labor/management conflict in the airline industry. This constant state of confrontation obviously contributes to the safety problems facing many companies. It is comforting to see a deal like the United buy-out, where labor/management confrontation will be replaced by labor/management cooperation.

Mr. President, some concerns have been expressed because up front cash for purchase of United Airlines has been put forward by a foreign airline, British Airways, but the percentage of ownership, about 15 percent, is well within the statutory 25-percent limit. I am concerned, however, over the attitude of the energetic Secretary of Transportation toward the United takeover and believe it would be imprudent of him to attempt to disrupt the timely completion of this rather exciting development. For once, a buy-out of an airline is being accomplished by someone other than an investor group with the short-term profit line uppermost in mind. If some adjustments in the financing provided by British Airways need to be done, that can be accomplished later, through clearly conceived changes in the law as might be proposed by Senator FORD'S Aviation Subcommittee, and not by the creative energies, well meaning as they may be, of a new Secretary of Transportation.

Mr. President, I have touched upon only a couple of the tips of the iceberg regarding the ownership and control of our vital national assets. We obviously do not have any coherent policy in this matter, and the last administration's head-in-the-sand attitude may well bring us some nasty returns in the future. It is a matter which should be of increasing concern to all Senators, and to the new administration.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from today's Washington Post entitled "Columbia Acceptance of Bid Puts Sony Into the Big Time"; another article, which is entitled "Thatcher Reported to Protest, Tighter Airline Rule Target of Objections"; another article entitled "Reports of Bid by Sony Raise Questions"; and another article from today's New York Times entitled "Northwest Deal Seen Changing."

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NORTHWEST DEAL SEEN CHANGING: MOVE BY UNITED STATES MAY REDUCE KLM'S STAKE

(By Agis Salpukas)

The Secretary of Transportation has persuaded the group that acquired Northwest Airlines to reduce the investment of a foreign airline in the deal, and is expected to use the case as a precedent for a new policy on how much equity a foreign carrier can put up in the buyout of a domestic airline, an airline-industry official said.

The official said Transportation Secretary Samuel K. Skinner wanted to use the Northwest case as a guideline in which other foreign airlines would be limited to putting up no more than 25 percent of the equity in a buyout.

Federal law limits a foreign carrier to no more than 25 percent of the voting stock of a domestic carrier, but does not address the question of equity capital invested in the deal.

POLICY ANNOUNCEMENT EXPECTED

Such a stand, which Mr. Skinner was said to be considering announcing within a few days, could affect a deal to acquire the UAL Corporation, parent of United Airlines, that has been approved by the company's board.

In that deal, British Airways is putting up $750 million, or 78 percent of the equity of the $6.75 billion buyout, which includes the airline's pilots and a group of UAL executives. In return British Airways would end up with 15 percent of the voting stock in the airline as well as preferred stock and a seat on the company's board.

While Mr. Skinner has not yet asked the UAL management to change its deal, industry people said UAL executives were already gearing up to resist the 25 percent guideline if Mr. Skinner seeks to extend it to the UAL buyout. A UAL spokesman said the company expected the buyout to be completed. A British Airways spokesman said the company needed more details before it could comment.

At a news conference yesterday, Mr. Skinner declined to discuss the Northwest agreement but said he hoped he would soon be able to discuss new policies regarding leverage buyouts and foreign investment in United States carriers.

In a speech on Sept. 19 Mr. Skinner said he was concerned about the investment of foreign carriers in domestic airlines, particularly in buyouts where foreign carriers were investing large amounts of equity even if they received a much smaller percentage of the stock. He implied that the foreign carrier could exert control beyond its voting stake in the airline and beyond its seat on the board.

An airline-industry executive said that Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher of Britain had expressed through the State Department her concern about any attempt to limit the investments of foreign airlines in American carriers. The executive said Mrs. Thatcher noted that many American companies have made large investments in British firms.

In the Northwest deal, KLM/Royal Dutch Airlines agreed to contribute $400 million in equity—representing 57 percent of the buyout—in return for 5 percent of the voting stock as well as additional preferred stock.

The industry official, who did want to be identified, confirmed a report in The Wall Street Journal yesterday that Northwest and Alfred A. Checchi, the Los Angeles investor who led the $3.65 billion buyout of Northwest, had agreed with Mr. Skinner to have KLM cut its investment to $175 million, or 25 percent of the new equity. KLM would also lose its seat on the Northwest board, the industry official said.

Whether Mr. Checchi can carry out the agreement with Mr. Skinner could depend on what KLM does. A person familiar with the talks noted that KLM has a legally binding agreement with the investor.

That person said KLM therefore thought it had legal grounds not to go along with the changes but was concerned about the reaction of other investors who had put up money for an equity stake and did not want to alienate top people in the United States Government.

The airline official said that Mr. Checchi was raising the money to make up for the loss of $225 million that KLM would be asked to cut back.

A KLM spokesman said the company would have a statement today.

Industry people said any attempt by Mr. Skinner to reinterpret the Federal Aviation Act could raise concern in Congress and that such opposition might give the leaders of the UAL buyout a strong position to resist.

Mr. Skinner's concern about leveraged buyout and foreign investment developed during the Northwest takeover and then extended to the UAL buyout, under which current stockholders would get $300 a share and UAL employees would end up with 75 percent of the stock. In his Sept. 19 speech, he said that "when a foreign airline is willing to contribute a large share of the equity capital in return for a relatively small percentage of voting stock, we need to examine all aspects of control. What does the foreign airline think it is buying?"

He said that when an airline of another country holds a substantial equity position in a United States airline, the way the Government negotiates with other governments over rights of airlines could be altered radically.

Mr. Skinner met with Stephen M. Wolf, the chairman of UAL, on Sept. 6 and was informed on the progress of the buyout.

On Sept. 22, Jeffrey N. Shane, the Assistant Secretary for policy and international affairs in the Transportation Department, asked Mr. Wolf, in a letter, for detailed information on the transaction, particularly on the $750 million put up by British Airways.

Mr. Shane said the Transportation Department needed the information "to analyze whether the acquisition will affect United's fitness and citizenship."

Mr. Shane also noted in the letter that Section 401 of the Federal Aviation Act requires the department "to modify, suspend or revoke the authority of such carriers if they are found to have failed to comply with the continuing fitness requirements or to supply such reports as we deem necessary to determine the carrier's fitness."

In an earlier interview Mr. Shane raised the possibility of using the law to monitor leveraged buyouts of airlines and investments by foreign carriers.

"The United Airlines employee ownership plan was carefully structured to comply with all applicable United States laws," said Lawrence M. Nagin, senior vice president of corporate and external affairs. "Therefore we are confident that we will be able to complete this transaction."

COLUMBIA ACCEPTANCE OF BID PUTS SONY INTO THE BIG TIME

(By Paul Farki)

Columbia Pictures Entertainment Inc., parent of the Hollywood studio that produced such classics of the American cinema as "It Happened One Night" and "On the Waterfront," agreed yesterday, as expected, to be bought by Sony Corp., the Japanese electronics giant.

The purchase will cost Sony $3.4 billion in cash, plus the assumption of Columbia's $1.4 billion in debt, making it by far the most expensive acquisition of a U.S. company by a Japanese concern. The transaction, widely rumored since Monday but unconfirmed until yesterday, makes Sony the first Japanese company to buy one of the seven big firms that dominate the production of movies and television programs.

Coupled with its $2 billion purchase of CBS Records in 1987, the Columbia acquisition would boost Sony into the same league as the handful of diversified media and entertainment companies that are expected to dominate the worldwide market in the 1990s.

However, unlike such competitors as Time Warner Inc., Bertelsmann A.G. of West Germany and News Corp. of Australia, Sony would be the only one able to produce both programming, or "software," and manufacture the hardware—televisions, stereos, videocassette recorders and camcorders—on which it is played.

By acquiring Columbia, which also owns the 820-screen Loew's movie-theater chain, Sony will have a role in almost every step of an entertainment property's life—from producing a movie and its soundtrack album, playing them in its theaters and then selling them to the home video and audio markets. Columbia is also the leading producer of network television programs.

Analysts expect Sony, because it can package hardware and software together, to be a leader in introducing such new entertainment technologies as videodiscs, high-definition TV, digital audio tape and 8mm videocassettes. The purchase is also likely to spur other hardware manufacturers, such as Phillips, NV of the Netherlands, to consider purchasing the remaining major movie studios that may be vulnerable to a takeover—MCA Inc. and Paramount Communications.

"Sony learned a lesson when they tried to sell the Betamax," said Liz Buyer, an analyst with Prudential Bache, referring to Sony's pioneering VCR technology that lost out to competing brands employing a different format. "They discovered that you can have the best hardware and no one will want it if the software's not there. . . . They're going to be the tail that wags the dog."

Federal officials said yesterday that the combination of Sony and Columbia is not likely to be challenged on antitrust grounds because the two companies don't have overlapping lines of business.

A source of CBS Inc. said the takeover was "another log on the fire" for the three broadcast networks in their efforts to repeal federal regulations that prevent them from owning a studio or entering the lucrative business of syndicating television programs.

"After Time-Warner, it was clear that any number of combinations were possible for American companies except for [the three networks]," the CBS source said. "Now, it's clear any combination is possible for companies around the world except for [the networks]."

Sony is likely to increase Columbia's spending on production, much as it did after it purchased CBS Records, said Douglas Gomery, a University of Maryland economist who studies the entertainment industry. "It's not obvious that Sony will do a great job," he said, adding that Coca-Cola Co., which owns 49 percent of Columbia, had invested heavily in the studio since 1982 with few hits to show for it.

Columbia yesterday confirmed reports that its two top executives, Victor A. Kaufman and Lew Korman, will leave the company once Sony's tender offer is completed.

The company is negotiating with Peter Guber, the independent producer who produced "Batman" for Warner Brothers, to replace Kaufman. Guber's partner, Jon Peters, is expected to join Columbia, most likely as the second-ranking executive behind Guber, if Guber signs on, said Michael Schulhof, vice chairman of Sony Corp. of America.

THATCHER REPORTED TO PROTEST

(By Martha M. Hamilton)

British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher has expressed concerns to U.S. officials over the possibility of tighter Transportation Department restrictions on such foreign investments in U.S. airlines as British Airways's proposed purchase of a stake in United Airlines, several sources said yesterday.

A White House spokesman said no telephone call had been received nor had there been any other type of communication, but several other sources said Thatcher had waded forcefully into the debate over foreign investment in U.S. airlines.

The Department of Transportation confirmed last night that the British government has contacted DOT and State Department officials about the proposed buyout of United Airlines's parent company, UAL Corp., that would give British Airways a 15 percent interest in the company.

The reported intervention by Thatcher comes as the airline industry is awaiting a report by DOT on the buyout of NWA Inc., Northwest Airlines's corporate parent, by an investment group headed by Alfred Checchi and including KLM Royal Dutch Airlines. Although Transportation Secretary Samuel K. Skinner said last week that he had made a decision on the transaction, it has not been announced.

According to several sources, DOT is seeking both a reduction in KLM's investment and an agreement by KLM not to seek a seat on the NWA board of directors. Those demands represent even tighter restrictions on foreign investment than federal law requires. Under federal regulation, foreign investors are restricted to a 25 percent stake in a U.S. carrier and to no more than a third of the seats on the board.

The fact that DOT is reported to be going beyond existing restrictions on foreign investment as a price for approving the Northwest deal has confounded airline industry officials and observers. For one thing, other airlines already have representatives of foreign investors on their boards. For instance, Scandinavian Airlines Systems President Jan Carlzon is a director of Texas Air Corp., in which SAS holds a 10 percent stake.

It also has raised concerns about possible retaliation against U.S. carriers that have investments abroad. "It has major implications for all future transactions," said Jon Ash of Global Aviation, an arline consulting firm. Ash added: "The U.S. may find it fairly unfriendly when some of their carriers want to make deals in Europe."

Europe is moving toward unifying its airline industry in 1992 with the advent of the single European Community market. European carriers, seeking to strengthen themselves to meet the increased competition, have been looking for merger partners worldwide. At the same time, U.S. carriers have been aggressively seeking to expand their operations in Europe and Asia.

Skinner refused to comment yesterday on the contents of his report on the NWA buyout, indicating that he hoped to unveil a done deal that might set the standard for future transactions. "We're going to withhold public comment 'til we've reached whatever agreement we're going to reach," he said.

REPORTS OF BID BY SONY RAISE QUESTIONS

(By Paul Farh and Stuart Auerbach)

On the subject of Japanese investment in America, Akio Morita, Sony Corp.'s chairman, recently wrote that the best investment is one that "will get Americans on Japan's side.

"If the number of Americans [who] view things the way Japan does increases," he wrote, then American politicians would probably stop "bashing Japan."

With Sony apparently on the verge of buying Columbia Pictures Entertainment Inc., one of the United State's largest and most venerable movie and television producers, Morita's comment has taken on some unexpected significance. The anticipated $3.4 billion purchase of Columbia is becoming a lightning rod for a debate about whether Americans will lose control of the entertainment industry, one in which U.S. supremacy is unchallenged around the world.

Most analysts believe foreign companies are seeking American entertainment properties merely for their investment value. In fact, Sony, which already owns CBS Records, has permitted its American-based management to make all of the major creative decisions.

But some observers are questioning whether this hands off policy will last and whether the trend presents an opportunity for foreign companies to exert influence on American public opinion and politics.

"It's not bad for the movie business and it's not bad for Columbia, but I wonder if its bad for America," said David Geffen, chief executive of the Geffen Co., an independent record and film company based in Los Angeles.

"It offers a potential for propaganda," added Pat Choate, an economist with TRW Inc., who is writing a book on Japanese influence in U.S. politics. Choate suggested that the government consider challenging Sony's proposed purchase. He compared the deal to a foreign purchase of an American television station, which is prohibited by federal regulations because of fears that a foreign owner could use his station to broadcase propaganda.

Columbia, which is 49 percent owned by Coca-Cola Co., said yesterday that its board will reconvene today and may act on a buyout offer from an unidentified suitor, widely unidentified as Sony. Sources said yesterday that the offer would be $27 a share, or about $3.4 billion. Sony declined comment yesterday.

If the deal is completed, Columbia—which made such movies as "Ghostbuster" and TV shows like "Who's the Boss?"—would be the third of Hollywood's seven major studios to be sold to a foreign company. An Australian company, Qintex Entertainment Inc., bought MGM/UA Communications Co. two weeks ago for almost $1.5 billion. Rupert Murdoch's News Corp., another Australian-based concern, owns 20th Century Fox. Japanese companies, meanwhile, have been pouring tens of millions of dollars into the production of independent films.

A fourth major studio, Warner Communications, merged with New York-based Time Inc. this summer, while MCA Inc., owner of Universal Studios, and Paramount Communications have been rumored takeover candidates.

In addition to their forays into the movie and television business, foreign companies have purchased four of the five largest record companies since 1985, including Sony's $2 billion purchase of CBS Records in 1987. Such prestigious book publishers as Doubleday, Harper & Row and Bantam Books also have been sold to companies abroad, as have several large song publishers.

As in other American industries, foreign takeovers in the entertainment industry have surged as the dollar's value has shrunk in relation to other currencies, making foreign purchases of U.S.-based assets relatively cheap. But the American entertainment industry also is the only one that consistently turns out worldwide hits, making ownership of an American producer essential to any company that hopes to compete globally.

Most analysts say Sony would be unwise to tamper with the content of movies and television shows made by Columbia. "If they are smart, they will let the people who know how to make movies make the movies," said Jack Jorgens, an American University professor familiar with the Japanese film industry. "If they are stupid, they will step in and try to run it like a car factory. That will be a disaster for everybody."

So far, there are few examples of manipulation of American-made movies by foreign-owned companies. The most celebrated incident involved a Tokyo film distributor that tried to censor newsreel footage of atrocities committed by Japanese troops in China during World War II from Bernardo Bertolucci's award-winning movie, "The Last Emperor." The distributor, however, was forced to restore the cuts after Bertolucci raised a public outcry.

But Jorgens and others said there is a possibility that Japanese owners would still bring some influence to bear on the movies and TV shows that Columbia produces.

"I don't think they would try to censor film, but I'm not sure what subtle pressures they might exert," said Eric Gangloff, associate executive director of the Japan-United States Friendship Commission.

"There is no question that if they do own Columbia Pictures there will be no films coming out that are stinging exposes of Japan," added Jorgens. "There is no question that they would object to a really juicy portrayal of the sexual behavior of their recent leaders. A film about World War II could become sensitive."

Some analysts point out that foreign takeovers of American media and entertainment companies are occuring at a time when foreign governments are moving to protect their own entertainment properties, often by imposing "content" limitations on their media. The European Community, for example, is considering a restriction on the amount of American-made television that can be broadcast throughout the continent following economic unification in 1992.

"So much of this investment is happening so fast that we have to stop and hold this up to the light and ask ourselves whether it's a good idea from a public policy standpoint," said Susan Tolchin, the co-author of "Buying into America," a book critical of foreign investment. Tolchin disputed the idea that foreign companies would unduly influence the content of American-made movies. But she said that when foreign companies buy U.S.-based firms they repatriate their profits, thus worsening the trade deficit.

"The question is, where does it all stop?" said Geffen, whose company produced the movie hits "Beetlejuice" and "Risky Business" and records by Guns 'N Roses and Don Henley. "If the Japanese came in and bought all the textbook manufacturers in this country, you can be sure someone in Congress would complain about the potential for abuse. Well, a giant part of the education of young people in this country comes from film and TV and someone should be paying attention to what's going on."

TERRY ANDERSON

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, today marks the 1,657th day that Terry Anderson has been held captive in Beirut.

I ask unanimous consent that a Washington Post article which appeared on the date marking the fourth year of Terry Anderson's ordeal be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 17, 1989]

HOSTAGE BEGINS FIFTH YEAR—ANDERSON SYMBOLIZES LEBANON'S DESPAIR

(By Nora Boustany)

BEIRUT, March 16.—It was a sunny morning in March four years ago today when American journalist Terry Anderson, shaking off suspicions that he was being observed and followed, decided to go ahead with his tennis game in a city where he felt he belonged.

But within minutes, gunmen intercepted his car, dragged him out and bundled him into a Mercedes with drawn curtains.

After covering the news of tragedies in Lebanon as The Associated Press bureau chief here, Anderson, now 41, became the news himself, as threatening statements from his pro-Iranian captors, the Islamic Jihad, shaped fears and expectations about his fate.

Today, he began his fifth year in captivity as the longest-held foreign hostage in Lebanon. Except for occasional messages, pictures and videocassettes distributed by his captors and containing appeals to the U.S. government and public, Anderson now rarely makes headlines, having become yet another nearly forgotten symbol of Lebanon's despair and chaos.

During his captivity, Anderson's father and a brother have died. A daughter, born shortly after his capture, has never seen him. Four other American hostages have been freed, as have all the French hostages.

One of the released Frenchmen, journalist Jean-Paul Kauffmann, freed last year after being held three years, made an impassioned plea today for rekindled public interest in the hostages, The Associated Press reported from Paris.

In the daily newspaper Le Monde, Kauffmann lamented that the hostages are no longer objects of mass compassion, no longer bargaining chips, no longer even political pawns.

"The truth is that the hostages in Lebanon today have become the damned of the West," he wrote. "Without hope of being saved, imprisoned in silence and darkness, deprived of the sight of the world of the living, forgotten, they no longer represent anything. . . .

"The most tragic thing is that this torment is administered as much from the outside by countries and people indifferent to their fate as on the inside by their captors."

Trapped in an unending game of conflicting interests involving Iran, Syria and local Lebanese groups that specialize in the business of hostage taking, Anderson and the eight other Americans still held hostage have become the only constant factor—their captivity a kind of insurance policy for their captors.

Although prospects of their release seemed to improve with a cease-fire in the Persian Gulf war last summer, Tehran's crisis with the West over a book many Moslems consider blasphemous to Islam has dashed hopes that Anderson and other hostages will soon be freed.

The controversial book, "The Satanic Verses," by British author Salman Rushdie, led to a reversal of Iran's moves toward rapprochement with western powers. The row over the book, deemed deeply offensive by Moslems, overshadowed the significance of detente between Iran and the West and the importance of the liberation of foreign hostages.

The other Americans still held captive are Thomas Sutherland, kidnaped in June 1985; Frank Herbert Reed, Joseph James Cicippio and Edward Austin Tracy, kidnaped in 1986; Alann Steen, Jesse Jonathan Turner and Robert Polhill, held since 1987, and Marine Lt. Col. William Higgins, kidnaped in 1988. Other hostages include Terry Waite, a representative of the Church of England, seized in 1987.

The kidnaping of Anderson has had a devasting effect on first-hand western press coverage of Lebanon, driving most foreign journalists from the country. The virtual absence now of outside journalists in a country that once served as a window for understanding the forces at play in the Middle East has had grave implications for international understanding and press freedom in the region.

Anderson—and the others—have become casualties in a struggle against a kind of darkness that has set in. In a desperate country that is daily at war or on the brink of war, the cause of absent journalists is fading. Concern over blockades, airport closures, safety and the bare instincts of life and death now predominate.

REFUGEE ADMISSIONS IN 1990

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, as required by the Refugee Act of 1980, the Judiciary Committee has recently met with the President's representatives to consult on the admission and assistance of refugees during the coming fiscal year. As required by the act, the committee has authorized me, as stipulated in section 207(d)(2), "to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the substance of such consultation" with the President.

On September 15, the Judiciary Committee held a public hearing to receive the President's proposal and to review the many refugee and other humanitarian problems we face around the world. As I noted at the hearing, this was the 10th occasion over the past decade we have consulted with the President's representatives on the admission of refugees to our country. But never, in recent years, has the number of refugees seeking shelter and protection been greater, nor have the root causes of the problem been more complex or international in scope, than it is today. An estimated 13 to 14 million refugees have sought shelter in every region of the globe. And never since the passage of the Refugee Act have the choices in the program been more difficult, or the budget more limited.

Daily we see their tired, weary, and beleaguered images—of men, women, and children fleeing their homes and lands for all the reasons that lie behind the violence and conflict that persists among peoples and nations. Refugees have almost become a permanent feature of the world's landscape.

As in the past, refugees are of concern to the American people not only because of our Nation's long and proud tradition of humanitarian concern, but because they also represent critical international and foreign policy problems. We know from recent history that massive refugee movements can unbalance peace and stability in the world as much as any arms race or political or military confrontation.

Mr. President, for both humanitarian and foreign policy reasons, we must help relieve the plight of refugees. That is why the Judiciary Committee takes seriously its mandate under the law to annually review our worldwide refugee programs.

Not too long ago, when we faced a refugee emergency we could respond through emergency appropriations, obtaining supplemental funds based solely upon the genuine needs of refugees. Today, because of rigid budgetary structures and ceilings, new humanitarian needs in one area of the world are pitted against equally urgent needs in other areas.

For those of us who care deeply about helping refugees, this imposes some difficult choices, and the need to balance carefully and wisely our different refugee programs—to assure that what we do in resettling refugees here does not reduce our ability to assist starving refugees overseas.

From Indochina to Afghanistan, Africa, and Central America—as well as the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe—the flow of refugees grows, and the complexity of the problems we face all the more difficult. The United States has a critical role to play in helping refugees. Literally millions of lives are at risk, and the leadership of our country has never been more essential in marshaling the resources of the world community—which, in the end, will make all the difference in our fellow human beings in so many distant lands.

Mr. President, for the RECORD, as required by Public Law 96-212, the Refugee Act of 1980, I would like to share with the Senate the President's request for refugee admissions and assistance in 1990, as presented in testimony to the committee by Deputy Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger and Ambassador Jewel Lafontant, U.S. coordinator for refugee affairs.

In addition, I ask unanimous consent that the concluding correspondence from the committee on the issues and concerns raised at the consultation hearing also be included at this point in the RECORD, with three accompanying tables outlining refugee admissions in recent years, and more particularly over 1989 and for the coming fiscal year.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, DC, September 25, 1989.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: As required by Section 207 of The Refugee Act of 1980 (P.L. 96-212), members of the Committee on the Judiciary have now consulted with your representatives on the proposed refugee admissions level for fiscal year 1990.

While we continue to support the objectives of your proposal—as we have in years past—we are very concerned that this year's proposed budgetary support will simply not meet refugee needs around the world. It was clear from the Committee's hearing on September 15th that the funds budgeted for 125,000 admissions falls short some $110 million from what will actually be needed to implement it, both here and abroad.

In short, without a reallocation of resources midway during the year, the pending refugee admissions proposal will clearly face serious fiscal or program problems.

We also want to once again express our concern that we maintain an appropriate balance as we allocate our resources between the resettlement of refugees in the United States and the provision of assistance to refugees in first asylum countries. As our refugee admissions have increased, our contributions to refugee assistance abroad have declined. It is important to keep in mind that for the $7,000–$8,000 we spend for each refugee resettled in the United States, more than 100 refugees in camps could be sustained. For many of the 14 million refugees around the world, our humanitarian assistance is a matter of life or death.

However, we commend you for your humanitarian leadership regarding refugee admissions for the coming year, even during difficult budgetary times. And while we concur in your proposal, we do so with the understanding that refugee numbers, and related budgetary limits, will require us to consult again with your representatives to make adjustments later in the fiscal year. In separate correspondence to Secretary of State James A. Baker, III, from members of the Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Affairs, these concerns will be outlined in more detail. We will remain in close contact with the Secretary and the U.S. Coordinator for Refugee Affairs as the refugee program is implemented during the course of the year.

Many thanks for your consideration, and best wishes.

Sincerely,

JOSEPH R. BIDEN, Jr.,
Chairman.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, DC, September 28, 1989.

Hon. JAMES A. BAKER III,
Secretary of State, Main State Department Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Attached is a copy of the letter the Judiciary Committee has sent to the President concluding this year's annual refugee consultations, under the terms of The Refugee Act of 1980. It offers our support, with reservations, for this year's proposed program of refugee admissions.

At the outset, we would like to note that this was the 10th annual consultation since The Refugee Act brought a significant degree of structure and permanence to our programs for admitting refugees to the United States. And while we greatly appreciated the appearance and contribution of Deputy Secretary Lawrence Eagleburger, and that of Ambassador Jewel Lafontant, U.S. Coordinator for Refugee Affairs, we deeply regret you were unable to testify at our long-scheduled hearing and meet the statutory requirement that a cabinet-level representative consult with the Committee.

With two exceptions, the President's annual presentation to the Congress on our refugee programs has been made, appropriately, by the Secretary of State—from Cyrus Vance under President Carter to George Shultz under President Reagan. We believe the appearance of the Secretary of State is appropriate because our refugee programs and policies toward them are fundamentally foreign policy issues—not procedural questions for resolution by the Attorney General responsible for the Immigration and Naturalization Service. Refugee programs also represent one of the largest portions of the Department of State's budget—often as high as one-fifth.

As several members noted at the hearing, we strongly feel that the Secretary of State, as the chief spokeman for our foreign policy, should represent the President at annual Judiciary Committee hearings on one of our Nation's principal foreign policy issues—our assistance and help to refugees. We will not accept this year's departure from that tradition as a precedent for the future. To do so, would risk the broad and bipartisan support our refugee programs have always enjoyed.

Regarding the key issues and concerns expressed during this year's consultations—which are reflected in the Committee's letter to the President—they center on two points: first, refugee numbers, whether they are sufficient, properly allocated, and how they will be administered; second, budgetary, whether funds will be adequate to the task and what adjustments will have to be made to meet both refugee resettlement needs here and refugee assistance programs abroad.

There was a clear consensus at the hearing that the proposed refugee admission numbers will be inadequate, particularly in light of developments in the Soviet Union. While the 50,000 set for Soviet refugees is a respectable proportion of the 125,000 proposed for resettlement worldwide, it will hardly deal with the backlog that already exists, much less respond to those already requesting or seeking interviews. After years of promoting the exodus of Soviet Jews and others who have faced persecution in the past, the United States cannot now close the very door it has tried to open for decades. Clearly, additional numbers must be forthcoming this fiscal year—which, in turn, will probably mean additional funding. We cannot take funds from equally urgent refugee programs in other areas, (which are already $58 million short), nor can we ask the private sector to fund more than the 10,000 from the Soviet Union they are already expected to assist, given the severe financial strain the private voluntary organizations have faced over the past year.

The only realistic answer is supplemental funding for the Soviet program during the fiscal year—a recognition that was clearly supported by the Senate during its consideration on September 20th of the Foreign Operations Appropriations bill. Hence, we would urge the Department to consult at the earliest possible date with the Committee to determine when and how much additional funding will be required in fiscal year 1990.

A second issue relating to the Soviet program deals with processing. As the Committee noted during the emergency consultations last April, and in our letter of May 26, 1989 to the President, we have been troubled over the continuing problems that have plagued the processing of Soviet refugee applicants. Since our consultations in May, the ensuing confusion, daily, and escalating costs of the program, particularly in Rome, have cost the State Department nearly $38 million in unnecessary but scarce refugee resources. We understand new initiatives are underway, and hope that the backlogs and uncertainty in Rome will be a thing of the past. In moving Soviet refugee processing to Moscow we urge the Administration to approach this transition with caution and flexibility, along the lines mandated by the Senate in the Foreign Operations Appropriations bill. If we are to avoid further delays, backlogs and inconsistent treatment of applicants, we must be generous and more flexible until new guidelines and new procedures are established in Moscow for the future. In this regard, we find it of utmost importance for the voluntary agencies to have a significant counseling role in the Moscow processing.

When (and not if) supplemental funding requests are formulated by the Administration for additional refugee assistance, we ask that you remain vigilant, as we have expressed before, that refugee resettlement needs here not be allowed to squeeze refugee assistance programs around the world—which help millions of refugees overseas in order to sustain refugee resettlement for a few thousand here. We can and should be able to do both.

In conclusion, there are three other refugee issues deserving of greater consideration by the Administration but, because of time constraints, could only briefly be discussed at the hearing.

The first relates to Cambodia, where the French-led diplomatic peace effort in Paris has temporarily failed and the conference adjourned until future notice. Over 350,000 Cambodian refugees along the border, and millions more inside Cambodia, are desperately awaiting for peace to return to their troubled land after nearly three decades of conflict. Our overriding policy should be to promote a peaceful future for Cambodia. This can only be achieved by preventing a return to power by the Khmer Rouge and Pol Pot. All Americans are thoroughly repulsed by the Khmer Rouge's history of butchery toward its own people and its continuing abuse even today of the refugees under its control along the border. There is strong support in Congress for a policy which opposes any future role for the Khmer Rouge and which will work aggressively without allies to cut off military and political support for the Khmer Rouge.

On its face, our policy today seems to be caving into pressure from the opposite direction. Our continued tolerance of the Khmer Rouge, via Prince Sihanouk's ever more mercurial leadership, undermines the peace process and can only prolong a civil war. It would be helpful to receive your views on our current policy objectives toward Cambodia following Vietnam's withdrawal and what actions the Administration has to isolate the Khmer Rouge.

Similarly, in Afghanistan, it is time to shift gears from a policy of supporting armed resistance to something that might be called a peace process. Continued military support only fuels a civil war when a military "victory" is not attainable. Soviet troops are gone—as is the basis for our original military assistance program. What American purpose justifies prolonging a civil conflict that has produced 5 million refugees desiring to return home, and an already devastated Afghan countryside? What is our current policy towards achieving peace in Afghanistan and promoting the repatriation of millions of refugees?

Finally, in Sudan, peace talks between the Khartoum Government and the southern Sudanese People's Liberation Army have also reached a standstill. Despite pledges to the contrary, the military government of General Al-Bashir seems to have failed to take advantage of efforts to bring the long civil war between north and south to a negotiated end. What are the prospects for the peace process being resumed and when? Earlier this year, after a Subcommittee staff missison to the field, we urged that the United Nations Secretary-General appoint a U.N. peace envoy if current negotiations then underway failed. Clearly, talks have not progressed since then, and the suffering of refugees throughout Sudan persists; is it not time to reconsider that recommendation for a special U.N. envoy, or some other international diplomatic initiative to end the conflict in Sudan?

There are many other refugee and humanitarian issues we will want to be in touch with you during the days ahead—particularly the problem of Indochinese refugees, such as the current crisis in Hong Kong, and the need to fully implement the Comprehensive Plan Action on Indochinese refugees adopted by the Geneva Conference in June. But we did want to flag these refugee questions at this time before meeting with you later.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

EDWARD M. KENNEDY,
Chairman.

TESTIMONY OF LAWRENCE S. EAGLEBURGER, DEPUTY SECRETARY OF STATE

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I am pleased to be here this morning to represent Secretary Baker at the annual consultations on the refugee admissions program. I will keep my opening statement brief in order to ensure that there is ample time for questions. At the second panel, Ambassador Lafontant, the U.S. Coordinator for Refugee Affairs, and Ambassador Lyman, the new Director of the State Department's Bureau for Refugee Programs, will present testimony covering the entire program.

I plan to concentrate on two subjects of particular concern to this Administration's foreign policy—Indochinese asylum seekers and Soviet emigration. As is apparent from the President's proposal for refugee admissions, the situations in these two regions are creating the greatest demands on our refugee policies and on our resources. Before turning to these issues, however, I would like to say a word about how our refugee programs relate to U.S. foreign policy.

REFUGEES AND U.S. FOREIGN POLICY

Refugees result from government oppression. One of the fundamental goals of U.S. foreign policy is to promote democratic values, human rights, and individual freedoms throughout the world. In every country where we identify a refugee problem, our first effort is to seek political change in that country so as to guarantee the respect for and protection of universally recognized human rights.

The ideal solution for any refugee situation is that the conditions which caused the refugees to flee be brought to an end. If and when political developments make it possible, refugees who have not been permanently resettled should return—voluntarily—to their homelands. To reconstruct a life in one's own land, with one's own language and culture, is for the great majority a far more humane solution than to become an outsider in a foreign land, however hospitable it may be.

Our humanitarian dilemma in responding to refugee situations lies in the uncertainty of the time frame in which political change will make the voluntary repatriation solution possible. We have had great hopes for the Afghans, yet the fighting in their homeland continues and the refugees remain in Pakistan and other neighboring countries. We have hopes for the Central American peace accord, so that Nicaraguans can return home in peace and safety. We hope that the recent repatriation to Namibia will be part of the successful birth of a new nation founded on democratic principles. We hope that a way to a peaceful future can be found for Cambodia. And we hope that political change in Poland and Hungary will remove those nations from their long-held position on the list of refugee-producing countries.

Almost all of the world's refugees and displaced persons are thus caught in limbo until such major political change occurs. The task facing the United States Government and the American people is to respond with our advocacy, with our leadership, and with our available resources to work toward the desired political change and, in the interim, to sustain the life and welfare of the refugees.

Within this context we must acknowledge that our refugee admissions program—which is separate from and in addition to the normal U.S. immigration program—gives a small minority of the world's refugees the extraordinary opportunity to become Americans. Yet, here too we are presented with a dilemma. To some degree it is the very promise of America that causes people to seek to leave their countries in search of the freedom and better life which America represents. We therefore must not create false expectations that are beyond our capacity to fulfill, lest we cause people to abandon their homes only to be left in limbo without any place to go. Moreover, as stated in the Refugee Act of 1980, we must encourage other nations to do their share in providing assistance and resettlement opportunities.

Let me now turn to the two most prominent refugee producing countries—Vietnam and the Soviet Union.

VIETNAMESE ASYLUM SEEKERS

Since 1975, over 1.5 million Vietnamese have been resettled in third countries: 900,000 of them in the United States alone. Not only has the flow of Vietnamese asylum seekers continued for 14 years, it has increased in the past two years. The enormous pressure that this has placed on the countries in the region led to their call for the International Conference on Indochinese Refugees that I attended in Geneva this past June. The principles endorsed by that conference, as set forth in the document called the Comprehensive Plan of Action (or "CPA") are of critical importance and can be summarized briefly.

First, in order for there to be a truly viable alternative to clandestine flight, Vietnam must allow the legal emigration of all persons eligible for resettlement country programs.

Second, nations in the region must allow asylum seekers to arrive safely and must treat them humanely.

Third—and this point is essential for our discussion today—there must be a legitimate process, in full compliance with international standards, to determine who is a bona fide refugee. In other words, the era of automatic resettlement for anyone who leaves Vietnam is over. Persons determined not to be bona fide refugees will not be resettled. Instead, they will be offered voluntary repatriation under a program administered by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR).

For the U.S. admissions program, there are two key elements in the CPA—one short-term, one long-term. In the short-term, we have made a commitment to join a multilateral three-year effort to resettle all of the Vietnamese asylum seekers who had arrived in first asylum countries prior to agreed cutoff dates. The U.S. share will be some 22,000 out of a total population of approximately 55,000—or 40 percent. I am pleased to report that our embassies, INS offices, and voluntary agency partners in the region are already vigorously at work to achieve half of the total U.S. offtake commitment in the first year. The United States is also committed to resettle our share of the new arrivals who are determined to be bona fide refugees.

The long-term goal is to expand and improve our Orderly Departure Program (ODP) so that Vietnamese qualified for U.S. immigration and refugee programs will have—and will believe that they have—full access to the avenue of legal emigration. To that end we have recently taken three initiatives. First, we have expanded the interviewing capacity of our consular and INS teams to a rate of 4,500 persons per month in Ho Chi Minh City. Second, we are pressing the Vietnamese to allow the departure of up to 20,000 immigrant beneficiaries per year—persons who would not require refugee numbers. And third, a new, historic agreement between the United States and Vietnam came into force on August 28 which provides for the resettlement in the United States of former reeducation center detainees and their families. This population, to which we have sought access through sustained negotiations for the past seven years, represents those Vietnamese who have suffered most due to their association with the United States or the Government of South Vietnam during the war period. These are the individuals with the strongest claim to U.S. resettlement, and it is therefore an extremely important development that they, too, will now have access to the ODP system. We hope to start interviewing these individuals as soon as October, beginning at a rate of 1,000 per month.

In sum, the Vietnamese refugee problem is longstanding and extraordinarily complex. It will not disappear simply because of the International Conference. Our response—indeed, the response of the 56 nations that participated in the International Conference—is an effort to gain control over the problem with a comprehensive set of policies and principles. We are trying to bring the numbers down to manageable proportions. We are trying to convey an honest and responsible message to persons still in their country of origin, so that they do not make life-changing decisions based on false expectations. And we are trying to expand the U.S. capacity to handle an orderly, legal emigration program in the country of origin.

SOVIET EMIGRATION

I would characterize our approach to the Soviet emigration problem in the same manner. We are trying to manage the surge in Soviet emigration in the most humane and orderly way possible within the limits of expanded refugee and immigration programs. We are trying to expand the U.S. capacity to deal with Soviet emigrants while still in their country of origin. And we are trying to avoid giving false expectations to potential emigrants.

The enormous increase in Soviet emigration over the past two years should be celebrated for the benefit it offers to people long deprived of this right. The Administration, the Congress, and the American people should be proud of our sustained and forceful advocacy of human rights for Soviet citizens, and particularly our insistence on freedom of emigration for Soviet Jews. This is a great success for our American foreign policy. In addition to the evidence of numbers, we now expect that the Supreme Soviet will soon act on new emigration legislation which would bring the Soviet Union far closer to acceptable international standards.

While we applaud these developments, we must be honest in appraising our national ability to respond to unprecedented, unpredictable, and previously unmanaged flows of people.

In FY 89 we have taken a series of interim measures to respond to this situation. Through the emergency determination process, the President more than doubled the refugee admissions ceiling for the Soviet/Eastern European region from 24,500 to 50,000. Congress responded promptly to the President's request for $85 million in supplemental funds. And Attorney General Thornburgh announced that he would exercise his parole authority to benefit all Soviet applicants who were determined not to qualify under the refugee provisions of the statute. In addition to these programs for refugee applications, the U.S. Embassy in Moscow also expects to issue approximately 500 regular immigrant visas in FY 89.

For FY 90, we are proposing a further increase in the refugee ceiling to 50,000 for the Soviet Union alone, plus 6,500 for Eastern Europe. We realize that there is a funding gap to be closed, which we estimate to be $58 million. The Administration is committed to working with the Appropriations Committees to find the necessary funds for the President's program, recognizing that we must do so without infringing upon other important foreign policy programs and priorities.

Finally, the Administration has introduced legislation which could take effect in FY 90 to provide for the admission as special interest immigrants of up to an additional 30,000 persons per year. This would replace use of parole as a vehicle for the admission of applicants from the Soviet Union and other countries who may be of special interest to the United States but who are unable to qualify as refugees. Our legislation would also adjust the status of parolees who have arrived in the United States over the past year to that of permanent resident.

These measures, however, will not suffice for the longer-term. The problem cannot be solved as long as the primary route for Soviet nationals seeking resettlement in the United States is through Vienna and Rome. The situation in Rome is extremely costly, requiring more than $34 million for care and maintenance in FY 89. Unfortunately, we are all familiar with the problem of Soviet emigrants in Rome who have not been found eligible for refugee admission and have not accepted the opportunity to enter the United States as parolees. We will certainly work to resolve the situation of these people—some 5,000 as of August 31. It is important that we institute a policy which ensures that no one leaves the Soviet Union in the future with false expectations as to the U.S. immigration laws and resettlement commitments.

For these and many other reasons, the administration has decided to put in place, effective October 1, a set of measures to ensure that new Soviet applicants for refugee admission are dealt with in Moscow rather than in Vienna and Rome. This involves expanding our processing capability at Embassy Moscow, and establishing a Washington center to assist the embassy with processing the application paperwork, in addition to diplomatic initiatives with the Soviet Union and other visa granting countries.

Accordingly, after October 1, Soviet emigrants seeking admission to the United States will be required to apply at the U.S. Embassy in Moscow, unless they possess an Israeli visas predating October 1. Persons departing the Soviet Union with Israeli visas dated on or after October 1 will be assumed to have left the Soviet Union with the intention of emigrating to Israel; they will not be eligible to apply in a third country for refugee admission to the United States.

Those who are already in the pipeline as of October 1—a number we estimate may be well over 30,000—will continue to be adjudicated according to current procedures.

Finally, because we anticipate that the demand for scarce refugee admissions numbers may exceed our proposed admissions ceiling of 50,000, we will have to put in place some system of priority for scheduling interviews in Moscow. In accordance with our customary practice in refugee admissions processing throughout the world, we shall give first priority to cases of family reunification. We will continue to interview and accept for U.S. admission persons without family ties in the United States. Since we can neither control nor predict demand, we can give no guarantee that everyone who wishes to apply can be processed in any given time period.

CONCLUSION

In closing, I would like to return to the point—which certainly applies both for Vietnam and for the Soviet Union—that the United States must make every effort to match our policies to our promises, and our promises to our resources. As foreign governments reform their treatment of legal emigration, we will continue to seek to expand our capacity to manage the orderly migration of people of concern to the United States. At the same time, we will endeavor to convey an honest and responsible message to persons still in their country of origin so that they do not make life-changing decisions based on false expectations.

The United States is the acknowledged world leader in the promotion of human rights in countries around the world. The generosity of the United States toward the world's refugees is a deeply rooted, bipartisan policy, which goes far beyond Washington to the beliefs of individual Americans and the activities of a myriad of voluntary, religious and community organizations. The trend toward liberalization and democratization in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe is an historic departure. Emigration is one manifestation—indeed, a central symbol—of the success of U.S. human rights polices. We now face the challenge of managing this success in accordance with our foreign policy interests, our humanitarian objectives, and our national priorities for utilizing scarce federal resources.

We believe the President's proposed admissions program for FY 90, combined with our new policy for Soviet emigration, will constitute the most responsible and consistent national policy for dealing with this challenge.

STATEMENT OF AMBASSADOR-AT-LARGE JEWEL S. LAFONTANT, U.S. COORDINATOR FOR REFUGEE AFFAIRS, BEFORE THE SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE, SEPTEMBER 15, 1989

It is a pleasure for me to be here this morning as the Administration's witness in these formal refugee consultations for Fiscal Year 1990. This is the first annual refugee consultations hearing of this Administration and my first such hearing as well.

We are consulting at an historic moment. As we meet today, thousands of East Germans are moving across the borders from Hungary to Austria and into West Germany where they have a chance for the first time to live in freedom. As the barriers to emigration fall throughout the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, more and more people are having the opportunity to emigrate to the West.

These trends are a tribute to the policies the United States has followed over the past years. We are pleased with these developments and take pride in the role the United States has played in helping create the conditions that brought them about.

Of course, the increased refugee flows bring problems in their wake. That is to be expected; but how much better it is to have to deal with the problems caused by the success of one's policies than to deal with problems caused by failure.

Although this hearing marks the beginning of the formal consultations process, it is not the first step in the process. Over the past few months, I have met with members and staff of Congressional committees concerned with refugee issues. I have had meaningful consultations with representatives of state and local governments, private voluntary agencies, public interest groups, the Office of Management and Budget, the Department of State, the Immigration and Naturalization Service, the Department of Health and Human Services, and others.

I have also consulted with the heads of international organizations who play such an important role in providing assistance to refugees overseas.

I recently travelled to Geneva and Rome where I met with host government officials and renewed my acquaintance with representatives of international organizations. During my trip to Italy, I had an opportunity to observe first hand the on-site processing of Soviet emigres. I visited the seaside town of Ladispoli where so many Soviet emigres are located. I talked to them in their cultural center and in the schools where they study English. The message they all conveyed was "please help us."

REFUGEE POLICY

Before providing an overview of some of the major refugee situations and the links between concerns and our refugee admissions proposals, let me briefly review the major tenets of our refugee policy, which are a manifestation of our nation's traditional humanitarian concern and assistance.

Our refugee policy embodies the fundamantal values of the American people: compassion, humanitarianism, idealism. We offer assistance to refugees not merely out of compassion but to promote stability in geographic regions of concern

Relief

An important part of our refugee policy is the mobilization of international relief assistance to the more than 14 million refugees scattered throughout the globe. For many of these people, international assistance is a life or death matter. The international assistance program encompasses a wide range of activities, including education, health and vocational training. Increasingly,international agencies are recognizing that care and maintenance are not enough if refugees are going to return to their homeland some day as productive members of society.

Over the years, the United States has taken the lead in establishing and supporting an international network of organizations whose purpose is to assist refugees to cope with their current situation and to give them hope for the future. The United States remains committed to continue our support for the vital programs these organizations carry out.

Resettlement

The second pillar of U.S. refugee policy is resettlement. Our policy is to support voluntary repatriation when conditions permit; to facilitate resettement in country of asylum or in a third country; and, when resettlement in the United States is the only alternative, to admit refugees who are of special humanitarian concern to the United States or whose admission to the United States is in our national interest.

U.S. ADMISSIONS PROGRAM

As you know, this is the eve of the tenth anniversary of the Refugee Act of 1980 which sought to establish a more uniform and equitable basis for refugee admissions to the United States. To this end, Congress adopted the definition of refugee as used in the U.N. Convention and Protocol relating to the status of refugees to which we became party in 1968, and removed the geographic and ideological limits found in the Immigration and Nationality Act definition of 1952.

The Act of 1980 established the procedure of formal Congressional consultations and specified the type of information required by the Congress. We have prepared this information for you in our Report to the Congress on Proposed Refugee Admissions for Fiscal Year 1990.

At this time, I would like to share with you a brief overview of some of the major refugee situations which require resettlement in the United States.

For Fiscal Year 1990 the President is recommending the admission of up to 125,000 refugees. That ceiling includes the subceiling for the following refugee groups of special humanitarian concern to the United States:

3,000 refugees from Africa,

25,000 from first asylum countries in East Asia,

26,500 from Vietnam through the Orderly Departure Program,

50,000 from the Soviet Union,

6,500 from Eastern Europe,

3,500 from Latin America and the Caribbean,

6,500 from the Near East and South Asia, and 4,000 unallocated privately funded.

Of the total proposed admissions number of 125,000, 14,000 are to be privately funded, including 10,000 from the Soviet Union.

Africa

As the Committee is aware, Africa is a region with serious refugee problems. There is a vast and growing number of refugees and displaced persons in need of life-sustaining support. Many African countries continue to provide opportunities for asylum, local resettlement and at times, voluntary repatriation. Malawi, for example, provides asylum for thousands of Mozambicans despite the impact on its own economy. Our major effort in Africa has been to provide assistance for emergency care and feeding in refugee camps.

With regard to refugee processing, we now have an INS post in Nairobi which has improved our ability to process refugees in Africa. In the Sudan, where asylum has been provided for hundreds of thousands of refugees, with the cooperation of the host government, we anticipate an early movement of some 2,000 Ethiopian refugees who are already in the pipeline.

The proposed ceiling of 3,000 is an increase of 1,000 over last year's ceiling of 2,000 and will provide opportunities for the admission of refugees already in the pipeline in addition to others.

East Asia

In meeting our commitments undertaken under the Comprehensive Plan of Action at this summer's International Conference on Indochinese Refugees, the President is proposing to admit from East Asia 25,000 refugees from first asylum and 26,500 refugees from ODP. The admissions from first asylum will allow the United States to continue its commitment to ease the burden of first asylum countries in Southeast Asia while encouraging broad participation in this international effort.

The proposed ODP refugee admissions ceiling of 26,500 includes an estimated 7,000 former reeducation center detainees to be admitted as refugees under the agreement recently concluded with the Vietnamese. This number will also include Amerasian immigrants who enter the United States under the provisions of separate legislation.

Soviet Union

We stand now in the midst of dramatic improvements with regard to emigres from the Soviet Union. This fiscal year, the United States will have admitted over 35,000 Soviet refugees. The liberalization of Soviet exit/entry is expected to further expand next year's flow.

Because of the substantially increased opportunities for emigration from the Soviet Union, the administration is increasing the ceiling from last year's 43,500 to 50,000. Of this number, 10,000 are to be funded by the private sector.

Eastern Europe

The President's proposal adopts the suggestion that separate ceilings be indicated for the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. The proposed refugee ceiling for Eastern Europe is 6,500 and should enable us to make a substantial inroad on cases presently registered for our program. The vast majority of persons registered by voluntary agencies and awaiting INS interviews are Poles and Hungarians.

Near East and South Asia

The proposed ceiling of 6,500 will provide for the admission of Iranians, Afghans and Iraqis as well as other nationalities on a case-by-case basis. Our concern for the persecution of religious minorities in Iran continues despite the death of Khomeni and the accession of a new regime. With regard to Afghans, we do not anticipate that their eventual repatriation will have a significant impact on our U.S. resettlement program.

Latin America and the Caribbean

The proposed ceiling for this region is 3,500. We are committed under the migration agreement of 1984 with Cuba to resettle all qualifyng former political prisoners and their families from Cuba each year. The proposed celing would also permit admission of up to 500 refugees from the region including former political prisoners in Nicaragua who were recently released from prison.

Our refugee admissions numbers are only a small part of the total numbers who enter the United States each year. During Fiscal Year 1988 over 391,834 immigrant visas were issued, of which number 270,000 were used.

Funding

It is apparent that the President's proposal carries with it important funding implications. Largely as a result of increased refugee flows that Soviet Union, the current budget requests for the State Department and HHS for FY 90 did not anticipate arrivals of this magnitude when setting funding levels for admissions and resettlement needs.

The recommended level for consultations is higher than that assumed in the State Department budget and will require about $58 million more for admissions than originally requested. The Department of State is addressing the international budget issues and is working with the Appropriations committees in an attempt to meet as much of our refugee admissions requirements as possible without an adverse funding effect on other important foreign policy programs and priorities. Once the appropriations process is complete, the administration will have to consider how it can best meet the unfunded requirements, if any. There is room on the domestic side, within the 1990 Bipartisan Budget Agreement, for Congress to provide necessary funding for the HHS costs of refugee resettlement. In addition, I plan to consult with my former colleagues in the corporate world to ask for their assistance in evaluating the potential for private sector input in refugee programs.

DOMESTIC RESETTLEMENT

I would like to turn briefly now to the domestic implications of our refugee policy. By the very act of admitting refugees to this country, we assume a certain level of responsibility for their successful integration into a new culture and a new environment. We are sensitive to the fact that refugees are a special class of immigrant, requiring, for an initial period of time, special forms of support and assistance. Many refugees who come here suffer the trauma of separation from their culture, their way of life, their home, their family members. Although overseas orientation programs help prepare refugees for resettlement, without the support of the private voluntary organizations and state and local governments, resettlement could not be effectively accomplished.

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, we will continue to work to resolve the root causes of refugee flows and strive to provide a refugee program to meet our international and domestic concerns within a humanitarian framework.

Thank you again.

I would be happy to answer your questions.

DAIRY POLICY

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I am deeply concerned about two bills recently introduced by Senator KASTEN. These bills pose a growing threat to Vermont and Northeast dairy farm families.

If enacted, this policy would cut farm income and throw even more New England farmers off the land. Vermont farmers would see a cut of over a dollar a hundredweight in the price they receive for their milk.

The Kasten bills would change the current market order system by restricting differentials, changing to multiple basing points, and allowing reconstitution of milk.

The result of all these proposals would be to reduce milk prices in Vermont and could bring a flood of milk from other parts of the country into New England.

I am determined to block this attack.

Both Senator KASTEN's bills give me great concern. His first bill, S. 1639, would repeal the 1985 class I differentials and establish multiple basing points in the marketing of milk. The second bill, S. 1640, would require that reconstituted milk be treated as a fluid milk product under the milk marketing orders.

Changing the established market order system has long been a goal of certain groups in the upper Midwest. Some have called for one nationwide order or individual State orders. The Great Lakes States are concerned about production growth in the South and argue that the only way to meet this problem is through drastic changes in market orders.

Although New England has high differentials, we are not contributing to excess milk production. While I share some of Senator KASTEN's concern about growing milk production in nontraditional areas, I will oppose any effort to close down the Northeast in an effort to control States like Texas, Florida, or Washington. I also should add that his bills would do nothing to control the California problem.

I urge Senators from other States to look carefully at the Kasten bills and talk with their local dairy leaders. As I read the policy behind the Kasten approach, I see a price cut in every region except for Wisconsin. This is not the way to go in dairy policy.

I urge my friend from Wisconsin to stop his attack on the Northeast and to work with the Senate Agriculture Committee to develop a sound and fair national dairy policy.

GEN. AL BREWSTER RETIRES

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I take the floor to congratulate a patriotic American upon his retirement and to thank him for a distinguished career in dedicated service to his country. I would like to recall some of the highlights of Brig. Gen. A.E. Brewster's 37 years of tireless professional service, first as an officer in the Marine Corps and then as the senior legislative affairs representative of the Northrop Corp.

Al Brewster joined the Marine Corps in 1952 and for the next 16 years served as a junior officer in a number of positions, which included commanding a ground platoon in combat in Korea and flying 105 combat missions in Vietnam. Subsequent assignments saw him posted to the Joint Service Command in Anchorage, AK, as operations and training officer; and to various command positions within Marine Aircraft Group 11 of the 3d Marine Aircraft Wing at El Toro, CA, before being elevated to air group commanding officer in August 1973. In July 1974, he commenced study at the Army War College and in 1975 was one of six marines graduating from this program. Next, he served in the 1st Marine Aircraft Wing in Japan before returning to El Toro as Chief of Staff for the 3d Marine Aircraft Wing. His final military assignment was as legislative assistant to the Commandant from 1977 to 1980.

General Brewster has followed up this impressive military career with equally distinguished professional service to the Northrop Corp., one of America's foremost aerospace contractors. He retires as Northrop's vice president for legislative affairs. Al Brewster has many friends in the House and the Senate. They wish him well but hope that he will be near at hand for counsel and fellowship. I salute Al Brewster for a job well done.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed.

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the majority leader.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, immediately following the rollcall vote on the Specter amendment, the Defense appropriations bill be temporarily set aside and the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of House Joint Resolution 407, the continuing resolution.

I further ask unanimous consent that there be 10 minutes of debate on the resolution; that the only amendment in order be one to be offered by Senators BYRD, HOLLINGS, and THURMOND, on which there be 30 minutes of debate, with 2 minutes for Senator BYRD and the remainder to be equally divided and controlled between Senator HOLLINGS and Senator THURMOND; that no motions to commit be in order; that the agreement be in the usual form; and that no points of order be in order.

I further ask unanimous consent that, following the disposition of the continuing resolution, the Senate return to the consideration of H.R. 2916, the VA-HUD appropriations bill; that the bill be immediately read for the third time and, without any intervening action or debate, the Senate then proceed to a vote on final passage of the bill.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, it occurs to me that perhaps Senator HELMS and Senator SANFORD may want to join as cosponsors. I assume they would be entitled to part of the time under this agreement since North Carolina is devastated quite badly, too.

Mr. MITCHELL. I see no problem whatsoever with that. I anticipate and assume that the distinguished Senators from South Carolina—I see neither of them present now—I assume that they would be willing to divide the time with the Senators from North Carolina.

Mr. DOLE. No objection

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I would also like to add, for the benefit of Senators, that it is my hope, upon completion of the Defense appropriations bill, that we can proceed to the last of the 13 appropriations bills, that being the State, Commerce and Justice appropriations bill.

I know I have discussed this with the distinguished Republican leader. I will, at an appropriate time this morning or during the day, seek consent to proceed to that measure upon completion of the DOD appropriations bill.

I think it important that we do complete action on these. Not only because, obviously, we are trying to proceed with all the appropriations bills as close to the end of the fiscal year as possible but also, under the previous order, we have to complete them before we can proceed to the legislative action on the drug bill.

I know Members on both sides are very anxious to proceed to that, and I hope we do not get held up on moving to the drug legislation or the State, Commerce, and Justice appropriations bill. We do have the 48-hour rule with respect to the report. That would be required to be waived and I will be requesting that. I wonder if the distinguished Republican leader might comment on that?

Mr. DOLE. I think the record should indicate we do have an objection to waiving the 2-day rule, which I assume would mean bringing the bill up on Saturday.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is correct. We have to bring the bill up this week. If we are unable to gain consent to waive the 2-day rule, then the Senate would have to wait until Saturday to bring the bill up and debate and enact it.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the distinguished Republican leader.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE APPROPRIATIONS, 1990

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will report the pending business.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 3072) making appropriations for the Department of Defense for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1990, and for other purposes.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

Pending: Specter amendment No. 882, to make funds available for multilateral anti-narcotics efforts.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, in a few moments we will be voting on an amendment to authorize the expenditure of funds under this bill for U.S. participation in a multilateral antinarcotics strike force as called for in the 1988 Drug Act, and further to provide for the sense of the Senate that multilateral action is also necessary with respect to drug treatment, drug research, and educational programs.

Mr. President, this amendment is offered to the Department of Defense appropriation bill because interdiction funds are included there. As to the demand side, it is the sense of the Senate that the appropriation can come from other appropriate sources.

Mr. President, yesterday the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN], chairman of the Armed Services Committee spoke in favor of this amendment, as did the distinguished Senator from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE], chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee.

We have, at the present time, the anomalous situation in Latin America where Drug Enforcement agents are going out into the field and are assisting, for example, Bolivia, a country I visited last year. They are not really trained for this kind of activity. They are not in the best condition for training.

At the same time the anomalous situation exists where special forces personnel who are equipped and are able to carry out such a function are not being utilized for this important purpose.

This authorization follows up on the lead taken by Prime Minister Michael Manley of Jamaica. So there is support from a Latin American country. The participation of the United States obviously is indispensable, and when we have declared war on drugs, this is not arrest, this is not search and seizure, this is an appropriate function for the military within the applicable laws enacted by the Congress.

I urge my colleagues to give a very solid vote in support of this provision to demonstrate to the President and the executive branch that the congressional support for this proposal is overwhelming.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I want to congratulate my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPECTER] for offering this amendment.

Drug trafficking is—without question—the No. 1 security threat in this hemisphere. The enormous profits generated in the underground economy of the international drug trafficking market allow the major kingpins to hire and equip armies, buy elections and intimidate foreign governments. The full diplomatic, economic and military power of the United States must be marshalled in response.

International drug traffickers show no respect for the integrity of national borders—in fact, the traffickers have frequently exploited the limits that national boundaries and excessive concerns about sovereignty have placed on drug enforcement efforts.

To counter this international threat, we need a truly international response. Last year, Congress directed the President and the Secretary of State to initiate negotiations to establish multinational antidrug strike forces to attack the major drug cartels.

Since that time, the Prime Minister of Jamaica, Michael Manley, has endorsed this idea and the heads of state in Venezuela and Spain have expressed general support.

Unfortunately, the administration has shown little interest in this approach. In response to my written questions to attorney General Dick Thornburgh, the administration stated that they have not initiated any type of negotiation to establish international strike forces, despite the clear support of several heads of state and the specific congressional directive in last year's drug bill.

Critics of the strike force approach have cited the political and practical obstacles to forming what would be international SWAT teams to attack the drug cartels. However, a strong precedent for such cooperative efforts already exists.

Last year, the International Drug Enforcement Conference [IDEC]—which is composed of the heads of the drug enforcement agencies of numerous governments, including the United States, Colombia and others—successfully coordinated joint multinational drug enforcement efforts in South America. DEA chief Jack Lawn labeled these operations an unqualified success.

The success of the IDEC operations demonstrate that multilateral drug enforcement can work. That is why the administration should immediately comply with the mandate in last year's drug bill by initiating negotiations to establish multilateral antidrug strike forces. And the United States should encourage other nations—particularly Jamaica, Venezuela, and others that have endorsed the strike force concept—to take a lead in developing the international strike force concept.

And these negotiations should begin immediately. The President, in his National Drug Control Strategy, proposed to convene an "Andean drug summit," with the heads of state of Colombia, Peru, and Bolivia to discuss the drug issue. The President and the Secretary of State should put the issue of multinational strike forces at the top of the Summit's agenda.

This amendment is a step in the right direction. It authorizes the administration to use funds in the Defense appropriations bill to pay for any U.S. participation in multilateral drug efforts, including multilateral antinarcotics strike forces.

However, this amendment is only a first step. Congress can authorize and direct the administration to act, but that is no substitute for the strong political commitment of the President and the Secretary of State to pursue every possible means to counter what has become the single greatest threat to our national security.

I congratulate my colleague from Pennsylvania for offering this amendment, and look forward to working with him on this issue in the future.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter from Michael Manley, the Prime Minister of Jamaica, dated September 5, 1989, with an enclosure, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER,
JAMAICA HOUSE,
Kingston, September 5, 1989.

Senator JOSEPH R. BIDEN,
Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR JOE: Recent events in Colombia bring into dramatic focus the monumental proportions of the crises we face in the struggle against drugs in the Latin-American and Caribbean region.

Earlier this year, it became clear to me that the region was on the verge of a major crisis if we did not act decisively and quickly. In response to this, I introduced, at the start of my administration, a series of multilateral proposals to fight the drug menace. These proposals included centralized intelligence, training for narcotics agents, education, rehabilitation and economic development to provide alternatives to the poverty stricken growers of plants that are the basis of the different drugs. It also included the creation of a Multilateral Strike Force as a last resort to combat the drug armies.

I am gratified by the response of the United States Congress and Senate to these proposals and wish to thank you for the personal interest you have shown in this initiative. Given the most recent developments, I have elaborated on my initial proposals which I am sending to you for your review and reaction.

I believe it is a programme which is desperately needed to begin the counter-attack against the drug cartels in this region and worldwide. I hope when Congress reconvenes you will consider such proposals as part of a regional response to the major challenge we all now face.

Sincerely,

MICHAEL MANLEY,
Prime Minister.

MULTILATERAL DRUG PROPOSAL

Considerable attention has been given to the multilateral strike force aspect of my proposal for international action in relation to drugs. This is misleading, for, while it is a critically important issue, the strike force is only one component of a comprehensive international strategy which I am proposing to combat this scourge. I therefore set out the elements of this broader proposal, which is gathering support throughout the Caribbean, in the United States and in countries like Venezuela and Spain.

(1) We will introduce a Resolution into the United Nations calling for the creation of an international capability in various areas of the drug struggle and inviting particular countries to become signatories and to pledge support and finance. It is to be noted that the U.S. Senate has already voted unanimously for a Resolution approving the idea and inviting the U.S. Administration to provide funds now allocated to the U.N. system to assist in the financing of this idea.

(2) Acting under the Resolution, to set up an organisation devoted to the development of the following capabilities:

(i) a central intelligence-gathering operation which would collate and coordinate all information on drug trafficking worldwide including financial flows which are a principal means of tracking the operations of the drug cartels;

(ii) A training facility devoted to

(a) narcotics agents in both the investigative and interdiction aspects, and

(b) agents trained in narcotics intelligence.

(iii) A reserve pool of narcotics agents and intelligence operatives with experience in different parts of the world. This pool could be used to make available to countries with inadequate resources in this field, on-the-ground support for specified periods of time.

This reserve capability would be particularly valuable for countries which are having their own people undergo training and would help strengthen the anti-drug operations in different countries while they are training to increase the effectiveness of their operations.

(iv) A division devoted to public education and other elements of the demand management side of the drug operations. There is a growing body of experience in different parts of the world about drug education in schools, in communities and in more general public relations programmes. A means of cross-fertilising research and knowledge in this field and having small groups of experts who could go to countries with the will to tackle this aspect of the matter could be invaluable.

(v) A central body of expertise in the mounting and maintenance of rehabilitation programmes. Already this aspect of the matter receives attention from a U.N. Agency with headquarters in Geneva.

A technical question would be whether to leave this under its present auspices or incorporate it into a single programme even if its headquarters remain in Geneva. I happen to favour the second course of action.

(vi) A central source of advice in the planning and administration of income substitution programmes. This could include levels of support that would make even seed finance available.

This programme is also in existence with headquarters in Geneva and receives considerable financial support, particularly from the Government of Italy.

Alternative sources of income for peasants who have spent their lives taking their children through the production of the ganja plant or the coca leaf, deserve and need help in adjusting after eradication programmes and in any event, represent a huge potential source of passionate opposition to any anti-drug operation.

(vii) A multilateral strike force under U.N. command and consisting of specially trained military personnel having regard for the nature of the drug operations which have reached the scale of virtually civil war or gang operations beyond the capacity of local security forces to handle.

Apart from the opportunity this would provide for developing appropriated expertise in this kind of fighting, the great advantage of the multilateral strike force is that it gets around the problem of sovereignty. For example, both the Colombian and the United States Governments have hesitated long over the question of whether to invite U.S. troops to help the Colombian Forces fight the Medellin cartel. In the end, both Governments retreat from the idea because the troops of a foreign power would immediately provoke a controversy about sovereignty. No such difficulty would arise if a Government were to invite a multilateral strike force under the United Nations command and sponsorship.

It is to be understood that all of these facilities which would be developed from small beginnings and grow as commitments, resources and experience expand, would be subject to the overriding principle that assistance would only be in response to a formal request from the Government of a particular country.

This plan has been introduced and won the support of CARICOM, received the unanimous backing in principle from both the Senate and House in Washington, has been endorsed in principle by the Presidents of Venezuela and Spain, and will be introduced at the Non-Aligned Summit and at the Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting in September and October of this year, respectively. It will be introduced as a formal Resolution in the United Nations immediately after the Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I rise to commend the Senator from Pennsylvania for this amendment and to urge my colleagues to support it.

The drug problem we face in America is part of a global crisis. As we have seen in the nation of Colombia, the drug trade not only affects our lives here in the United States, but threatens the stability of those countries that find themselves confronting powerful organizations engaged in the production and distribution of drugs. While interdiction and strikes against drug production facilities and drug cartels are not the sole answers to our drug problem by any means, they are essential elements. If we are to successfully restrict the production and distribution of drugs, we must work with those countries affected by this evil trade especially those within whose borders these activities originate.

Last month, I represented the United States Senate at the Inter-Parliamentary Union Centenary Conference in London, England. That important meeting of the association of the world's parliamentary bodies adopted a resolution condemning the violence threatening the survival of the Government of Colombia. It also urged all governments to take immediate action to assist Colombia, including measures to finance the conversion of land currently used for drug production.

Mr. President, I asked unanimous consent that the text of the Inter-Parliamentary Union resolution be made a part of the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Accordingly, as it commemorates the Centenary of the Inter-Parliamentary Union and thus reaffirms its founding principles, the 82nd Inter-Parliamentary Conference solemnly declares that it:

Condemns and deeply deplores the killings and the campaign of violence unleashed by the drug mafias in Colombia in recent weeks which threatens to destroy social order and cause the nation's disintegration;

Stresses the particularly heinous nature of the murder of Senator Luis Carlos Galán committed in a public place while he was engaged in the wholly democratic exercise of addressing his electors;

Supports unreservedly the appeal made by President Virgilio Barco and the Colombian authorities in defence of the nation's constitutional institutions, the rule of law and the system of freedoms;

Urges Parliaments, as institutions representing the people, to make their voices heard in condemnation of violence and in support of democracy and freedom in Colombia, and to press their Governments to take immediate steps, including measures to finance the conversion of land currently used for drug production, to co-operate effectively with the Government and people of Colombia and demonstrate their international solidarity.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, this amendment would assure that the United States could participate in multinational strike forces as envisioned in the Inter-Parliamentary Union's challenge. We must assist those countries whose very survival is threatened not only to help reduce the supply of drugs on the streets of America, but because we must help stop the killing and suffering of citizens in the drug producing nations. As I understand the amendment, the multinational strike force would not be sent into any country that did not request it, nor are any existing laws changed relating to how U.S. military forces may be used.

We must marshal all available resources if we are to effectively fight a war against drugs. I am pleased that the Senator from Pennsylvania has proposed this amendment. It is precisely the kind of reponse that we envisioned during our Inter-Parliamentary Union meetings in London and I urge its adoption.

. The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is one agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

So the amendment (No. 882) was agreed to.

CONTINUING APPROPRIATIONS, FISCAL YEAR 1990

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PRYOR). Under the previous order, the Senate shall now proceed to the immediate consideration of the continuing resolution (H.J. Res. 407) which the clerk will now report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H.J. Res. 407) making continuing appropriations for the fiscal year 1990, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time for debate on the resolution is limited to 10 minutes equally divided between the managers. In addition, there will be 30 minutes of debate on the Byrd-Hollings-Thurmond amendment with 2 minutes controlled by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and 14 minutes controlled by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND] and 14 minutes controlled by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HOLLINGS]. Who yields time?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may require from the 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, less than a week ago, on September 22, 1989, Hurricane Hugo slammed into the southeastern coast of the United States mainland near Charleston, SC after wreaking havoc in the Virgin Islands and Puerto Rico in the Caribbean.

Hugo caused unprecedented devastation to the islands in its path and the coastal and inland areas of South and North Carolina. As the storm moved ashore it brought with it several inches of rain and winds in excess of 100 miles per hour. As the storm moved north over land during the day it dropped several more inches of rain from Charleston to central Pennsylvania and New York State, including over my State of West Virginia.

Mr. President, the amendment which I will offer on behalf of myself, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. SANFORD, and Mr. HELMS will continue the direct Federal presence in the region of greatest devastation. It provides $1.1 billion to help clear debris, restore power, and protect public safety.

These funds are to be scored as mandatory under the bipartisan budget agreement and therefore neither the budget authority nor the outlays will be scored against the VA-HUD and Independent Agencies Subcommittee's 302(B) allocations.

Mr. President, do I have any time remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia has 1 minute 55 seconds.

Mr. BYRD. I reserve that time.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, how much time do I have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has 5 minutes.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I would like to say one word on the matter of the reason for the continuing resolution. I think it ought to be clearly understood that at this date the Senate Appropriations Committee has responded, acted upon, and reported every one of the appropriations bills to the floor. We have three to complete with floor action. There are those that have been sent to conference. There is one on the President's desk.

I should like to make a point of record on behalf of our committee, and certainly commend the chairman at the same time I make this point, that the Senate Appropriations Committee and the House Appropriations Committee have certainly acted in good time to try to avoid this continuing resolution. I think it ought to be pointed out that an ordinary problem of the drugs and that issue that superseded procedures and dates and all certainly is the reason, legitimate reason, for us having this particular continuing resolution

I join, as the Senator from West Virginia has indicated, in support of this one amendment relating to the disaster of Hugo in the Carolinas. I think it is straightforward, effective, October 25, no hidden agendas or anything else. It is a very straightforward formula, a classic extension of the fiscal year time in order to keep the Government running. I support the amendment.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, may I say that the House leadership has informed us that the House will accept this amendment if it is the only amendment, and the resolution will be quickly sent to the White House so that the devastated areas can receive relief quickly.

Mr. President, my remaining time I yield to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HOLLINGS].

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I thank our distinguished chairman, Senator BYRD, for his leadership, as well as our majority and minority leaders. Likewise, it is good to work with my distinguished senior Senator, Senator THURMOND, on the same problem. I also thank the distinguished chairman of our Budget Committee, Senator SASSER, and the extraordinarily capable efforts of the outstanding Senator from Maryland [Ms. MIKULSKI].

In this amendment, we are providing under the Budget Act for mandatory expenditures outside of the 302(b) allocation. Let me emphasize that this is not only for the Carolinas; it is also for Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands. Everyone should grasp the magnitude of the blow inflicted by Hugo. At Charleston Air Base they clocked winds of 166 miles an hour. The hurricane hit at high tide. It threw up a 20-foot surge of water, which not only covered totally the Barrier Islands but back miles behind by the Inland Waterway, wiped away houses in McClellanville and Awendaw

It has now left 40,000 people with homes uninhabitable or totally destroyed. It has severed electric power and communication lines. In the affected counties, 36 percent of trees are on the ground. Seventy percent of trees in the national forests are down. One-third of the highway system is damaged. Crop losses stand at $100 million, and that number will rise.

Yet, amidst this wreckage and ruin, the word generosity has taken on new meaning. Sam Walton, of Arkansas, called all his suppliers and sent 14 tractor trailers with food and diapers along with the experts to help us in the distribution of relief supplies.

Amoco, Metropolitan, and Philip Morris, to name just a few, have been extremely generous. The cities of Greenville in my own State, and Virginia Beach have sent firefighters. Wilmington has sent food. It has been one magnificent response. The Red Cross, the Salvation Army, the National Guard, right on down the list. And Washington was immediately responsive; Secretary Skinner of Transportation sent the Coast Guard into action. We had choppers sent in to rescue people who had been caught on the islands. The Marines, the Army have both pitched in generously.

Yet there is one glaring exception to this excellent performance, and that exception is exactly the agency which is supposed to spearhead assistance in time of a disaster; namely, the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

As they say back home, "I didn't come to town on a turnip wagon." I know something about civil defense, having started with Gov. Nelson Rockefeller 30 years ago, when we had the Office of Civil Defense mobilization. That effort evolved into the Office of Emergency Planning and finally into FEMA, Federal Emergency Management Agency.

I was on the phone as soon as I came back to Washington late Friday night and on Saturday morning with Mr. Robert Morris of FEMA. I said, "We need generators. It will be weeks before we can restore electric lines." He said, "I don't have any generators." I said, "Man, come on. Let's quit kidding. I do not expect you to have them in the office. But surely you know how and where to get them." He said, "We don't have any."

Just to follow that thought, I pursued it even on Sunday with him. He said local officials had not filled out the necessary forms. Then he said local people had not said they needed generators. This is just plain obtuse. Right this minute, Berkeley County needs 44 generators to get a sewer system to prevent disease, and every one of those island areas and small towns have obvious, self-evident needs for generators. FEMA shouldn't have to wait for requests. And spare me this application-form nonsense.

On Saturday, I turned to General Gray and the Marines. Thanks to General Gray and Lieutenant General Cook out of Norfolk, VA, who was flown immediately down to South Carolina, we received a shipment of equipment from Camp Lejeune, NC. We used it immediately to keep the hospitals going.

On Sunday FEMA continued to stonewall me. I appealed to the White House, to Governor Sununu, and then to Gen. Colin Powell and Secretary Cheney, who were all most helpful. The National Guard has done a magnificent job, but we need additional manpower.

I fought from Monday until last night. We finally obtained a supply company out of Fort Stewart to help us distribute the massive supplies coming in. The media has done a magnificent job of reporting the scale and tragedy of this disaster.

Food aid is coming in. We do not want it to spoil. We can move it to other places. For instance, on Sunday when the city of Wilmington sent two truckloads of food to Charleston, the mayor of Charleston sent them up to Summerville. Yesterday morning the sea food company at Beaufort called and said "I know you are working on the evacuation. We have 1,000 hot fish meals coming to all of your workers there in Charleston." The mayor said, "My crowd can eat sandwiches. Send them to Awendaw where they were totally wiped out where there is no store, no food, no housing. They are huddled in the cold and wet as it continues to rain."

So there has been a magnificent sharing of resources, and if we can get that distribution shortstopped in all of these other towns, then we can get supplies going into all 17 impacted counties in South Carolina: Dorchester, Charleston, Berkeley, Georgetown, Horry, Orangeburg, Sumter, Calhoun, Lee, Clarendon, Florence, York, Williamsburg, Chester, Lancaster, Kershaw, and Fairfield.

Mr. HOLLINGS. FEMA said with pride, "We are going to announce the opening of five FEMA offices to service 17 counties. So you ought to feel good in Charleston, where you have two." I said, "Where are those two?" They said "Over on Sam Rittenberg Way and across at East of the Cooper." I said, "That is the suburbs. What is the poor fellow down in the city to do, walk to the blooming suburbs to apply? Come on, now. You need five offices in Charleston alone. What are the people in North Charleston going to do, nothing? Eighty thousand people, and no office." They countered that there is "no application," no need.

It is an outrage. These are supposed to be the experts. They knew Hugo was coming. They could track it across St. Croix and Puerto Rico. This is the outfit we count on to take charge in a catastrophe. Instead they install themselves as the chief bottleneck. It is the sorriest bunch of bureaucratic jackasses I have ever encountered in my life. And now I receive telephone calls from within FEMA from people who said "Senator, you are exactly right. I have been here 17 years, and they just don't do anything. They study how to deliver the mail after a nuclear disaster." What in the world good is that going to do?

I appreciate the President's decision to visit South Carolina tomorrow. It will educate him to see the magnitude of the destruction. Maybe he will witness the wonderful cooperative spirit, and the excellent response of the Corps of Engineers, the Army, Marines, and Coast Guard. But we need still more troops. We need still more generators. We need temporary shelter and housing. The trailers are all bottlenecked in Atlanta, GA.

They are giving me the application-bureaucratic-red-tape routine when they ought to be moving those trailers right now to take care of the homeless. I tell you there is one disaster worse than Hugo, and that disaster is the FEMA crowd up here in Washington.

Senator THURMOND and I went down last Friday, and said the President has declared the disaster, everything is coming. Then every time I turn around there is another roadblock, bottleneck, and stonewall, another stupidity by that FEMA crowd.

So let me thank the leadership once again. FEMA cannot say they are short of money. There is now $1.1 billion for the Virgin Islands, Puerto Rico, and the Carolinas. This is only the beginning. I can tell you here and now that the total damage is going to be nearly $3 billion to $4 billion and some estimates are as high as $5 billion. You have no idea of the damage. The military alone have damage of $200 to $300 million on their various bases, although they took extensive measures to secure the equipment.

The Forestry authorities are ready to go in and salvage the forests, but FEMA said we do not need it yet. All this emergency effort is being bottlenecked right here in Washington, and the people of America ought to understand.

I yield to the distinguished chairman of our committee.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator.

AMENDMENT NO. 885

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, with the understanding that the time consumed here is to be charged in accordance with the agreement, I send the amendment to the desk on behalf of myself, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. SANFORD, and Mr. HELMS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD], for himself, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. SANFORD, and Mr. HELMS, proposes an amendment numbered 885.

On page 8 after line 2 insert the following:

SEC. 107. For necessary expenses in carrying out the functions of the Robert T. Stafford Disaster Relief and Emergency Assistance Act (42 U.S.C. 5121 et seq.), an additional $1,108,000,000 for fiscal year 1989, to remain available until expended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. THURMOND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized. The Senator from South Carolina has 14 minutes.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today in strong support of the amendment sponsored by the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Senator BYRD; Senator HATFIELD, ranking minority member; Senator HOLLINGS; Senator HELMS; Senator SANFORD, and myself.

I am extremely pleased that this amendment provides an additional $1.1 billion for the Federal Emergency Management Agency to be used for disaster relief. This money will benefit the areas that were recently devastated by Hurricane Hugo. I am deeply gratified that the administration responded so promptly to my request of several days ago to do this.

As my colleague are aware, last week, Hugo ripped through South Carolina, North Carolina, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands. The hurricane which was one of the worst in history, has caused severe, damage. In South Carolina the damage estimate has already surpassed $3 billion. In recent days, the outpouring of support from people around the Nation in the form of contributions of food, clothing, technical assistance, and money, has been incredible. The disaster victims deeply appreciate the generosity of their fellow man.

This additional funding, today, will further aid these people in the slow process of rebuilding their communities, homes and, most important, their lives. I want to take this opportunity to personally thank all the public and private agencies who have contributed to the disaster relief effort. Among these public agencies are the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the Army Corp of Engineers, the Department of Labor, and the Department of Housing and Urban Development. The Department of Defense has also been helpful—Robert Page, the Assistant Secretary of the Army for Civil Works went with me to Charleston last Monday, and he showed all the necessary support from the Defense Department.

Further, I have contacted the Department of Justice, and asked them to expedite the request submitted by Governor Campbell for $1.1 million to assist law enforcement. The Department of Agriculture is also cooperating. We had a meeting here yesterday in my Capitol office with Department of Agriculture officials, and they are trying to help in every way they can. The Small Business Administration [SBA] has been involved. Last Monday, at my request, they sent a representative to South Carolina to join us when we met with mayors and other groups. Additionally, Susan Engeleiter, the Administrator of the SBA has been to South Carolina.

In addition, I want to thank the Red Cross and the Salvation Army for their cooperation and assistance. Both organizations have been raising funds to help in this effort.

I want to commend Governor Campbell of South Carolina for the fine way in which he has handled this matter. He declared an emergency and mandated that people move out from the beaches. This action saved hundreds of lives. If this had not been done, I am sure we would have had a great loss of life. The only figures we have on loss of life so far is around 18.

I want to thank President Bush for agreeing to go to South Carolina tomorrow. I made a request to the White House a few days ago, and they said they would work it in, if they could. Senator Hollings and I will be going down with him on this trip tomorrow.

Additionally, I would like to thank the President, Governor Sununu, and others at the White House for their support. Governor Campbell's request for designation as a Federal disaster area was approved in record time.

I am pleased that this funding by the administration is being provided in this vehicle, so it will be able to reach the areas that so desperately need it in the most timely fashion. I know my colleagues realize the urgency of this situation, and I hope they will support this amendment.

I also want to express my appreciation to the Alabama Baptist Convention. Additional, the utilities, have been diligent in their efforts to restore power and telephone service to South Carolina.

I want to especially thank South Carolina Electric and Gas, South Carolina Electric Cooperation, Southern Bell as well as many other companies from outside the region.

I want to express my appreciation to the following towns that have adopted towns in South Carolina for the purpose of providing assistance: Marion, IA—Marion, Middleburg, VA—Moncks Corner, and Travelers Rest, SC—McClellanville.

Many companies have assisted in various ways—Mead Johnson, Philip Morris, General Mills, the Ross Co., the Northwest Lumber Association, Northern Telecom, Home Insurance Co., Robinson Lumber Co., and many others. I do not want to exclude some, but fortunately they are too numerous to name all of them. We wish to express our sincere appreciation to all of them.

I also want to express my appreciation to the people that have assisted in the food drive that will be conducted this weekend. I contacted the Atlantic Coast Conference, and the Southern Conference and they have agreed to collect canned goods at 10 games that will be played on Saturday, September 30. They are asking those who attend those games to bring canned goods. Trucks will be sent to haul the food that is collected down to the areas that are so badly affected.

Mr. President, I want to say that in my lifetime I have not seen as much damage as I saw in this disaster area. South of Charleston, from Kiawah, there was a little damage. I do not believe Hilton Head was damaged or the area toward Savannah. However, the beaches, beginning with Folly Beach on up to Isle of Palms, Litchfield, Myrtle Beach, Cheny Lake, and extending to the North Carolina line, were severely damaged.

I went to South Carolina last Friday and surveyed the entire coast of South Carolina, from the beginning of the devastation in Charleston up to where it ended at the North Carolina line. I am sure Senator HELMS will tell about the damage to North Carolina. I have never seen so much damage in my life. It looked like there had been a war. The section is entirely ravaged, and we need all the help we can get down there.

In addition to the water and wind damage along the beaches, the storm, along with tornadoes, turned inland and severely damaged the eastern section of the State.

I visited the air base in Myrtle Beach, and there were some roofs taken off there. I went to Shaw Air Force base in Sumter, and every building and home there was heavily damaged. Trees, 3 and 4 feet in diameter, were popped off like toothpicks. I have never seen such devastation.

Senator HOLLINGS and I are working hard to get all the help we can down there. I want to mention that we have worked with Congressman RAVENEL who has been most diligent in serving his congressional district.

I have also been in contact with the following mayors in South Carolina and I commend them for their efforts: Mayor Gisson, Myrtle Beach; Mayor Riley, Charleston; Mayor Cockfield, Lake City; Mayor Creech, Sumter; and Mayor Pearce, Florence.

We are very appreciative of the cooperation of all concerned in connection with this effort and I am now going to yield several minutes, whatever he requires, to Senator HELMS of North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DIXON). The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I thank the able Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. President, this amendment provides $1.1 billion in additional funds for the Federal Emergency Management Agency [FEMA]. These funds will help the people in North Carolina, South Carolina, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands recover from the Hurricane Hugo disaster. This emergency money will help many North Carolinians get back on their feet.

Mr. President, we all watched as Hurricane Hugo sowed a path of destruction from the Virgin Islands to Puerto Rico, to the Carolina coast. The people in North Carolina and South Carolina prepared for the worst. They boarded up their homes and their businesses and they evacuated coastal areas.

No one was prepared for the magnitude of the destruction. Hurricane Hugo wreaked havoc in North Carolina. In all, 51 counties were affected by the hurricane. The Charlotte area was among the hardest hit—70- to 90-mile-per-hour winds battered our State's most populous region. After the hurricane swept through, over 500,000 people were left without electricity. Over 200,000 will be without electricity for 2 weeks. About 120,000 are without water.

Many homes and businesses were damaged by fallen trees and the high winds. Here is a summary of the preliminary reports about the number of homes and businesses that sustained damage. Mecklenberg County: 675 homes damages, 6 destroyed, 89 businesses damaged, 4 destroyed. Gaston, Union, and Lincoln: 185 homes damages, 10 destroyed; 914 businesses damaged, 5 destroyed.

Mr. President, another hard-hit area was Brunswick County, which is on North Carolina's coast. The hurricane devoured a lot of the sand and many of the dunes that protect oceanside property. Between Holden Beach, Long Beach, and Ocean Isle, over 135 homes were destroyed and about 350 were damaged. These numbers are staggering.

The damage estimates are almost beyond belief. The preliminary damage estimates for four counties in North Carolina already tops $883 million. I have been informed that the final damage estimates could exceed $1 billion.

In light of the magnitude of the damage in North Carolina, as well as other areas, Senator THURMOND and I requested an additional allocation of $1.1 billion for FEMA. These additional funds will be used to help people rebuild their homes and their businesses.

Governor Martin requested President Bush to declare North Carolina eligible for disaster relief. I supported the Governor's request, and on Monday President Bush declared four counties disaster areas.

Mr. President, after Hugo hit North Carolina I called the officials in North Carolina to offer my assistance. I was on the phone most of Sunday and Monday trying to help out where I could. We were able, for example, to get more generators for Charlotte and expedite other aid.

The folks at the White House and at FEMA have been very helpful. I am especially grateful to Bob Morris, acting director of FEMA, and John Sununu, Chief of Staff to the President. They have done everything within their power to help us get the assistance that we need. I also thank President Bush and Richard Darman for supporting this additional $1.1 billion for FEMA. The allocation of these additional funds is the first step toward recovery for disaster stricken North Carolina.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a letter written by Gov. Jim Martin, to the President requesting disaster designation and my own letter on September 25, supporting that request.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Raleigh, September 23, 1989.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, DC.

Through: Mr. Major P. May, Regional Director, Federal Emergency Management Agency, Region IV, 1371 Peachtree Street, N.E., Atlanta, GA.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Under the provisions of Section 401, Public Law 93-288 as amended by Public Law 100-707, as implemented by 44 CFR 206.36, I request that you declare a major disaster for the State of North Carolina as a result of Hurricane Hugo, September 21-22, 1989, which caused damages that are estimated to be in the millions.

In response to the situation I have taken appropriate action under State law and directed the execution of the State Emergency Plan on September 20, 1989.

On September 22, 1989, I requested a joint Federal, State, and local survey of the damaged areas. Preliminary assessments are incomplete at this time.

I have determined that this incident is of such severity and magnitude that effective response is beyond the capabilities of the State and the affected local governments and that supplementary Federal assistance is necessary. I am specifically requesting Temporary Housing, Disaster Unemployment Assistance, the Disaster Loan Program of the Small Business Administration, Food Stamp Program, and Public Assistance. Preliminary estimates of the types and amounts of assistance needed under Public Law 93-288, as amended, will be provided when known. Detailed documentation of our situation is being prepared and will be submitted as soon as possible.

The following information is furnished on the nature and amount of State and local resources that have been or will be used to alleviate the conditions of this disaster: Activation of the National Guard and Highway Patrol for security and support for evacuation and rescue; and activation of all other State Emergency Response forces for support of Emergency Operations.

I intend to implement the Individual and Family Grant Program (IFGP).

I certify that, for this major disaster, the State and local governments will assume all applicable non-Federal share of costs required by Public Law 93-288, as amended by Public Law 100-707.

I have designated Joseph F. Myers as State Coordinating Officer for this request. He will work with the Federal Emergency Management Agency in damage assessment and may provide further information or justification on my behalf.

See attachment for preliminary list of affected counties.

Sincerely,

JAMES G. MARTIN.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, September 25, 1989.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I don't believe anyone will need any persuasion that the State of North Carolina suffered disastrous circumstances when the so-called Hurricane Hugo swept through the Central and Western Piedmont sections of North Carolina on September 22.

I certainly join our Governor Martin in formally requesting that you issue a disaster declaration for those counties that were so severely damaged.

Needless to say, the Governor and I are absolutely persuaded that assistance is needed from the Federal Emergency Management Agency, and other appropriate federal agencies, to help the citizens in those areas to begin their recovery from this disaster.

I do hope that there can be swift approval of Governor Martin's formal request.

Many thanks, and kindest personal regards.

Sincerely,

JESSE HELMS.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator for yielding to me and I yield the floor.

INCREASED FUNDING FOR FEMA

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. President, I rise today to express my strong support for this special appropriation of $1.1 billion for the Federal Emergency Management Agency [FEMA]. It is certainly pleasing that the Federal Government has acted in a quick manner to provide assistance to those affected by Hurricane Hugo.

As you all know, after the terrific damage in our Virgin Islands, the Carolinas were devastated by the worst hurricane to hit the eastern coast in two decades. While the South Carolina coast bore the initial blow from the storm, the coastline of North Carolina and the western part of the State also sustained terrible damage. Fifty-one North Carolina counties sustained wind and flood damage from the hurricane, 5 counties in the State have been declared national disaster areas. Storm damage estimates for the State of North Carolina will exceed $400 million.

I have visited areas hit by Hurricane Hugo and have heard numerous stories of personal tragedies and heroic relief efforts, and I am pleased that the Federal Government will lend a badly needed hand to the determined people of North Carolina.

Mr. President, I have been very impressed with the quick action and excellent cooperation that has been provided by FEMA to my office and most importantly, to the people. FEMA has acted in a professional, efficient manner, and I look forward to working with the Agency to ensure that those affected by the storm receive priority assistance.

Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, this appropriation of $1,108,000,000 is the amount that the committee has been advised by the administration will be required to address the currently estimated disaster relief needs of those areas devastated by Hurricane Hugo. It should be noted that once a disaster declaration has been made, no specific limitation on assistance levels are determined, and all eligible claims are honored within the total budgetary resources available to FEMA. So even if it is later determined that this estimate of $1.1 billion is too high or too low, all eligible costs will be covered. Again these eligible costs will be covered from this appropriation, or if the $1.1 billion is insufficient, from funds carried over from prior years, or from the $100 million appropriation contained in the regular fiscal year 1990 appropriations bill.

Mr. President, it is my understanding that this extraordinary appropriation is being treated, for budgetary scorekeeping purposes, as a mandatory item and as such will not affect current scoring of the fiscal year 1990 Appropriations Act. This means that budget authority and outlays flowing from this appropriation will not be added to amounts provided in that bill for the purpose of determining compliance with the section 302(b) subcommittee budget allocation, nor will an adjustment for possible later requirements be added to the $100 million appropriation included in both the House and Senate versions of H.R. 2916.

This is important to understand because the conference committee on that measure already confronts extremely constrained budgetary limitations within which to accommodate the differing priorities of the House and the Senate. Reaching a satisfactory compromise between the two versions of this bill may already be virtually impossible, given our limited allocation. But it is clear that there is no way to even partially include the costs of addressing the devastation of Hurricane Hugo within the parameters of the subcommittee's budget allocation.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, I rise in support of this continuing resolution, and in particular for the $1.1 billion we have made available to relieve the victims of Hurricane Hugo.

In the past few days, the hearts of all Americans have gone out to the people of the Virgin Islands, Puerto Rico, and North and South Carolina because of Hurricane Hugo.

As the storm approached our coast, we all recognized that it would cause severe damage. But it was only in the storm's aftermath that our country realized that Hugo's destructive force was probably worse than any hurricane in this century.

This supplemental appropriation will go a long way to providing these effected areas with the resources they need to recover from this terrible tragedy.

It will provide FEMA with money:

To assist those individuals and families who have lost their homes and all the possessions they have spent a lifetime accumulating;

To continue the direct Federal presence in the Carolinas and the Caribbean in helping to clear debris, restore power and basic infrastructure, reduce threats to public safety, and protect private property; and

To pay for basic supplies that will be used to provide food and shelter to those victims of Hugo who have no where else to go but their local disaster relief office.

In providing this supplemental, the Senate is saying that the budget and appropriations process can anticipate many things, but that we cannot anticipate, or budget for, an act of God.

None of us knows if the funds we are providing today will be enough for our country to recover from this storm. In all candor, I suspect we will need more funding for this purpose in the future. But this special appropriation is a substantial downpayment on the responsibility which we have as a nation to aid our fellow citizens in their time of need.

As chair of the subcommittee that oversees FEMA's disaster relief program, I want to especially commend my distinguished colleague on the Appropriations Committee from South Carolina, FRITZ HOLLINGS, for his work on this funding proposal.

Without his persistence and skill, this special supplemental appropriation simply could not have been acted upon in such a timely fashion.

His efforts in this time of great need for the Carolinas have been extraordinary, and the people of South Carolina are very fortunate to have such a forceful and resourceful advocate for them in the Senate.

I pledge to work with him, and all those who represent areas affected by Hugo, in the coming months to make sure that we do all that we can to repair the damage and destruction caused by Hugo.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Six minutes on the side of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Let me yield 2 or 3 minutes to my distinguished colleague from Nevada [Mr. REID].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, in this morning's news I heard the junior Senator from South Carolina criticize FEMA. I heard that and I wanted to take a few minutes on the floor this morning to indicate as to the experience that the Senator from South Carolina has had with FEMA, he does not stand alone. We have had experience in the State of Nevada with FEMA and it has not been good.

With the PEPCON explosion which was devastating in the loss of human life, injury, and absolute devastation of personal property we found FEMA not responsive. We found them extremely political. For example, they were leaking to a person who was running for public office some of their reports as to whether or not there would be aid. Then there was aid. Then there was no aid. Then there was aid, and then there was no aid. This was all leaked through political sources.

When I served in the House of Representatives I served on then the subcommittee chaired by Senator GORE, then a Member of the House, where we held hearings on FEMA and their efficiency, and it was not good.

So in short, Mr. President, I report to the people of South Carolina and the people of this country that they better keep an eye on FEMA because FEMA has not been responsive to the people of the State of Nevada and I hope that the people of South Carolina are treated in a more responsive, a more professional, and a more precise fashion than in fact the people of Nevada have been treated in the past.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, the Federal Emergency Management Agency is the group expressly tasked with preparing for disasters and responding to them with expert contingency plans, equipment, food, you name it. The idea is that, when a catastrophe hits, you press the button and FEMA springs into action with an elaborately planned relief effort. That is the theory. But the reality is that FEMA is a bureaucratic morass. It has descended on South Carolina with an army of form-pushers and nay-sayers.

Yet you cannot even get to Sullivan Island or Isle of Palms to find a form to fill out. There is no city hall left in all these other places to get the appropriate form.

At the same time, my friends in Puerto Rico are calling me; they are having trouble down there filling out forms. They say that in Puerto Rico they cannot get anything out of FEMA.

I spent all day Monday down in my State. I asked, "Where is that FEMA fellow; I am going to wring his neck," because every time I would get things moving in the Pentagon for assistance, FEMA would say we do not need it or you have not filled out the necessary forms.

FEMA is totally inadequate and shot through with politics. It is a tragedy in South Carolina. We have had enough of delegations coming to South Carolina and expressing their concern. We want results. Enough of this blizzard of forms. The mayors and public entities can maintain accountability. We know how much we owe. Senator THURMOND and I can take care of it at the Federal level.

The military are yearning to help, the Corps of Engineers and the Seabees, right down the line. Fort Bragg is calling my office and saying: "It would be a wonderful readiness drill. Can you arrange it? It would be a good exercise." We need them.

The question is whether it is going to take 10 weeks to get South Carolina back on its feet, or is it going to take 10 days. We could use all that military manpower and right this minute.

They sent that FEMA fellow up in a helicopter surveying, surveying, surveying; he did not have any answers to anything. He was hiding. I can tell you what he was doing. They stay clear of me. I cannot catch them. So do not come around here praising that FEMA crowd and thanking them. I tell you that they are the bottleneck.

What a contrast to the tremendous generosity and response South Carolina is receiving from all over this country. Last night at 10 o'clock I obtained the donation of 120 portable toilets from Waste Management Association. We need them in areas where we do not have sewers. There are countless basic needs of this kind. Hungry people are still standing in line; they still need food.

This is not a weekend drill for the National Guard. It is a long haul. But we can expedite relief by bringing the military in with a responsible command entity. I assure you that they have the expertise to take over and move the relief supplies and manpower.

The local officials are keeping an accounting, and they can give us the bill at the State and Federal level. We can handle it from there. This is no time to stand in line and fill out forms and jump through hoops. Our people ought to be given the grants now. They are in desperate circumstances and we are choking on redtape and bureaucracy.

I thank the distinguished Chair.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, in closing, again, I wish to thank the Government agencies for all that they have done to help. We will continue to call upon them and I am sure we will get the necessary cooperation.

I wish to thank everyone again for all the help we have received. If anybody wishes to contribute food or anything else to help in this disaster, I put a statement in the RECORD this past Monday that lists where they can send food, money, or other assistance (Page 21434).

Again, we appreciate the cooperation of people all over the country for everything they have done to help us in this time of catastrophe, suffering, and trouble.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired on the amendment.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I believe I asked for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been requested on the amendment.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I withdraw that request.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, parliamentary inquiry. I understand the yeas and nays had already been ordered on the amendment, as might be amended. The Senator has now withdrawn his request on the amendment.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I stand corrected.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, the VA-HUD appropriations bill for 1990 as reported by the Senate Appropriations Committee provided $100 million in new budget authority for FEMA's disaster relief programs. These new resources, coupled with an estimated $60 million in unobligated 1989 funds and $50 million in estimated recaptures during 1990 were expected to meet FEMA's disaster relief needs for 1990. No one could have anticipated a hurricane with the destruction of Hugo.

FEMA now estimates that the costs of disaster relief to the Virgin Islands, Puerto Rico, and the Carolinas will exceed $938 million. Mr. President, it is clear that we must provide funds well in excess of the $100 million in the continuing resolution. Today we are providing an additional $1.1 billion as an amendment to the continuing resolution and we will provide whatever additional resources are needed in the future as the actual extent of the damage becomes clearer.

Mr. President, I would like to enter into a colloquy with the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee, Senator SASSER, to discuss the budget treatment of the additional funding for FEMA necessitated by Hurricane Hugo. In particular, I would like to discuss with the Senator from Tennessee whether the Budget Committee will treat these additional funds as mandatory or discretionary appropriations.

Mr. SASSER. I thank the Senator. Under our current scorekeeping conventions, the FEMA disaster relief accounts are classified as discretionary. Thus, the $100 million already provided in the continuing resolution for FEMA is classified as a discretionary expenditure, and was so scored in the Senate Budget Committee's scoring of the VA-HUD appropriations bill when the Senator from Maryland brought that bill to the floor. Given the unforeseen nature of the expenditures for Hurricane Hugo, and the urgency of the situation, the Budget Committee has decided to alter the classification of the FEMA disaster relief account, and treat the funds needed for Hurricane Hugo as mandatory expenditures in 1990. Therefore, the Budget Committee will not score the budget authority and the outlays associated with the Hurricane Hugo moneys against the 302(b) allocations for the VA-HUD Appropriations Subcommittee. Any additional funds provided in the future for this disaster will also be considered mandatory expenditures, and therefore outside of the 302(b) limits imposed under the Budget Act.

I would like to note, however, that this treatment of the FEMA disaster program as a hybrid mandatory/discretionary account is relevant only to the funding for damages relating to Hurricane Hugo given the extraordinary needs that give rise to this decision. Any proposed increases in 1990 in the FEMA disaster relief account for expenses not related to Hurricane Hugo will be considered as discretionary spending. The Budget Committee plans to revisit the future mandatory or discretionary treatment of all the disaster-related programs later this fall.

Ms. MIKULSKI. I would like to thank the chairman for his assistance on this matter. This ruling by the Budget Committee makes it possible to provide the urgent relief needed without delays that would otherwise follow. I also want to note that I know the Senator is concerned about the overall deficit picture and I would like to assure the Senator from Tennessee that despite the differences in outlays between the House and Senate VA-HUD appropriations bills, that it is my intention to return from conference with the House with a bill that will remain within the Senate's 302(b) limits for both BA and outlays.

Mr. SASSER. I thank the distinguished Senator from Maryland for her assurances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 885) was agreed to.

ESSENTIAL AIR SERVICE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the committee recognizes that the terms of this continuing resolution as applied to the Essential Air Service Program would not provide sufficient funding through October 25, 1989, if funds were apportioned on a pro rata basis. Therefore, the committee intends that the administration recognize the seasonal patterns of the essential air service obligations and apportion sufficient funds to enable the program to continue without interruption.

The committee understands that the Essential Air Service Program would require $2 million to provide 1 month of subsidized air service. The committee expects that sufficient funds will be made available under the terms of the continuing resolution to enable the program to continue without interruption.

I yield to Mr. LAUTENBERG, who is the chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Transportation.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, very quickly, both the Department of Transportation and OMB recognize the need for this approach on a temporary basis. They have agreed to proceed following the committee's intentions. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment of the amendment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read a third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution having been read the third time, the question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

So the result was announced—yeas 100, nays 0, as follows:

DEPARTMENTS OF VETERANS AFFAIRS, HOUSING AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT, AND INDEPENDENT AGENCIES, BOARDS, COMMISSIONS, CORPORATIONS, AND OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS 1990

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the clerk will now report the VA-HUD appropriations bill, H.R. 2916.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 2916) making appropriations for the Departments of Veterans Affairs and Housing and Urban Development, and for sundry independent agencies, boards, commissions, corporations, and offices for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1990, and for other purposes.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I request the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, as ranking minority member of the Senate Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I am most pleased to rise in support of H.R. 2916, the proposed "Departments of Veterans Affairs and Housing and Urban Development, and Independent Agencies Appropriations Bill, 1990."

I commend Senators MIKULSKI and GARN, the chairman and ranking minority of that important subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, for their outstanding work on this bill. They have worked hard to send to the floor of the Senate a reasonable bill.

Specifically, with regard to the proposed fiscal year 1990 appropriations for VA medical care, I note that the bill proposes to increase that account by $773 million over the President's request. The total for VA medical care programs under this legislation is $11.5 billion. This is truly an extraordinary amount of money.

Some Members of Congress will argue that this is not enough. To those I say, we may never have enough to do all we would like. However, we must live within the fiscal realities which we face.

I thank the Appropriations Committee members for their fair treatment of VA programs as outlined in this legislation.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator from Maryland, the distinguished subcommittee chairman, yield for a question and brief discussion regarding the Department of Housing and Urban Development's Technical Assistance Program?

Ms. MIKULSKI. I would be happy to yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. WILSON. As the Senator may know, the city of East Palo Alto is a small, recently incorporated low-income minority community with inferior resources and inadequate staffing. Nevertheless, the city is faced with extraordinary community development opportunities in the area of high technology. In vast contrast to its neighboring Palo Alto and other communities located in San Mateo County, East Palo Alto is in dire need of technical assistance in order to plan and manage community development block grant supported development activities and housing programs.

While I know it is very late in the legislative process to raise this issue, I do seek the managers' assistance in asking HUD to work with East Palo Alto because, typically, we do not earmark technical assistance funds.

In my view, the type of assistance and expertise available under the HUD Secretary's technical assistance fund can provide the valuable support this city needs to take full advantage of its CDBG Program and to purse what I see it really needs in terms of building assessed valuation so that this community can begin helping itself.

Ms. MIKULSKI. I would like to comment very briefly on my friend from California's remarks. The Senator is correct in stating that our subcommittee prefers not to earmark technical assistance funds out of the Secretary's discretionary fund for specific projects. Nonetheless, we recognize that the Secretary has broad discretion in administering technical assistance grants to distressed communities such as East Palo Alto, and I join with Senator WILSON in hoping that HUD would give an application from East Palo Alto every consideration so that block grant funding can be used to increase its tax base and provide jobs and housing for its low-income residents.

Mr. GARN. I would also like to offer my assistance and look forward to working with Senator WILSON, another former mayor, as East Palo Alto seeks Federal relief and guidance.

Mr. WILSON. I thank the distinguished managers.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an errata sheet that outlines minor typographical errors in Senate Report 101-128, the report accompanying the 1990 appropriations bill for VA, HUD, and independent agencies be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the errata sheet was ordered to be printed in the RECORD; as follows:

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the bill now before the Senate, the fiscal year 1990 VA/HUD/independent agencies appropriations bill. I do so with great reluctance, however, because there are a number of provisions in the bill which merit the support of this body.

Notwithstanding those provisions, I am very concerned about the expensive budgetary gimmicks hidden in this bill. For starters, the Congressional Budget Office and the Office of Management and Budget score this bill differently. While CBO finds the bill to be consistent with the 302(b) allocation in both budget authority and outlays, the Office of Management and Budget estimates that the Senate bill is $427 million above the 302(b) allocation for discretionary budget authority. The majority of this increase is a result of VA lease-purchase contracting arrangements for five construction projects. These lease-purchase arrangements are much more costly and are inconsistent with the administration's general policy of federally financed construction projects. Mr. President, I do not oppose or question the need for new VA facilities. My opposition is strictly targeted to a method of financing which costs the Federal Government more money than we can afford to spend while we are struggling to meet our Gramm-Rudman targets.

Unless I miss my guess, Mr. President, I don't believe we will meet those targets and the ensuing sequester will result in more dramatic cuts across the board than anyone would like. I think we should take this opportunity to reject this legislation and put forth a more sensible proposal to help prevent that sequester.

The second provision which I have great reservations about is the inclusion of language which authorizes lifting the current limitation on Federal Housing Administration loans. At a time when the FHA is having severe difficulty in bringing any rhyme or reason to its current budgetary situation, I must question our rationale in adopting this unsound provision. In effect, we are financing homes for middle income Americans who can readily obtain mortgage loan from private lenders. This is unwise fiscal policy and will only compound FHA's financial problems.

Also, Mr. President, it has been brought to my attention that there are a number of construction projects in this bill for which the committee has provided budget authority, but the outlays for these various projects are not obligated until late in the fiscal year, so we do not get the full charge for their expenditures in the accounting year in question. This is one of the worst examples of budgetary gimmicks that I can think of and I hope that we will have the foresight to defeat it.

In closing, Mr. President, I must admit that it disturbs me greatly to vote against this legislation because it contains funding for veterans benefits. As a veteran myself, I feel strongly about their needs and have been particularly concerned in recent months about the shortfall in funds for VA medical care which has dramatically reduced the VA's ability to treat patients. To address that growing need, the committee has included $11.5 billion for medical care for fiscal year 1990. I commend the committee for recognizing the needs of our aging veteran population and wholeheartedly support efforts to accommodate their health care needs.

Once again, I will stress that my vote is not cast in opposition to veterans' benefits, Federal housing programs, the space station, or any one particular provision of this bill. These are necessary programs which I advocate. Instead, I am voting against this legislation because it is not sound fiscal policy and will jeopardize our chances of reducing a deficit which is an even greater threat to the overall economy of this Nation and the veterans who have so bravely served it.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise in support of the fiscal year 1990 VA, HUD, and independent agencies appropriations bill.

Mr. President, I first want to express my thanks to the Chair of the VA, HUD, and Independent Agencies Appropriations Subcommittee, Senator MIKULSKI, for her outstanding work on this bill and for her help in securing funding for several items that I had personally requested. Senator MIKULSKI has taken on one of the most difficult subcommittee assignments in the Senate, and has done a remarkable job in a very short time. Her excellent staff, led by Kevin Kelly, Carrie Simmons, and Michelle Burkette, also deserves enormous credit. I would also like to thank our distinguished ranking minority member, Senator GARN for his efforts to shape this bill, and to note the fine work of Stephen Kohashi of his staff.

Mr. President, I am especially pleased that this bill includes $50 million for the Public Housing Drug Elimination Act, a program I developed in the 100th Congress. The problem of drugs in public housing has reached crisis proportions. Many housing projects are virtual war zones. Tenants are afraid to leave their apartments, and violence has become routine.

The Public Housing Drug Elimination Act will provide tenants and housing authorities with much-needed tools to fight back. The act establishes a competitive grant program, under which funding is provided for additional security, tenant patrols, physical improvements designed to enhance security, and innovative antidrug programs.

Earlier this year, the Congress approved $8.2 million for the program in the fiscal year 1989 supplemental appropriations bill. Fifty million dollars therefore represents more than a 500-percent increase.

Since the supplemental appropriations bill was enacted, HUD reports that it is being inundated with inquiries from housing authorities around the country. I know in New Jersey there has been a tremendous response to the program. Clearly, the need for such funding is enormous.

Mr. President, I am also pleased that the bill includes $1.2 million for the planned Newark, NJ, Performing Arts Center. The center promises to contribute significantly to the revitalization process now underway in Newark.

Mr. President, this bill also does a very good job of addressing many of our environmental priorities. While I would have liked more for Superfund, I realize the constraints under which the subcommittee labored. The bill achieves the highest Superfund appropriation in the history of the program, funding the program at $1.575 billion. That's $150 million more than the House and last year's appropriation.

We achieved this Superfund level while increasing construction grants by $800 million above the President's budget, and overall EPA funding by $700 million over the budget request. The administration's failure to request sufficient resources for construction grants and other programs made it very difficult to address the growing needs of the Superfund program. I hope President Bush will respond to this bill by realizing that future budgets must address not only Superfund, but construction grants and other vital programs at EPA.

I would like to note a number of provisions in this bill to which I have given special attention.

The bill has a special provision for the Lipari Landfill, the No. 1 site in the Nation. The measure includes $273,000 to study the health consequences on area residents of exposure to Lipari Landfill.

The bill also includes what would be the highest appropriation to date for implementation of the Emergency Planning and Community Right to Know Act (title III). I have sponsored a series of measures that raise total funding for this program to about $34.74 million, including $3.84 million for State grants by the Federal Emergency Management Administration under section 305 of title III. The measures I sponsored in the EPA accounts provide additional headquarters and regional resources and personnel for the Office of Solid Waste and Emergency Response, the Office of Pesticides and Toxic Substances, the Office of Enforcement and Compliance Monitoring, and the Office of Research and Development for priority activities identified in the report, including enhanced implementation of the emergency planning and emissions inventory requirements of title III. I also note that, like the House report, the Senate report includes language clarifying that funds requested in the budget for assistance to States for AHERA and funds for assistance for State efforts under title III, including those of State emergency response commissions and local emergency planning committees, should be provided pursuant to section 28 of the Toxic Substances Control Act.

The bill includes necessary statutory authority to allow EPA to receive a Defense Department helicopter to perform medial waste surveillance flyovers to the New Jersey-New York Shore. This is in addition to a $3.9 million increase over the President's budget for ocean dumping, medical waste tracking, and plastics pollution programs.

I am encouraged by the $50 million increase in the measure for the Clean Water Act's nonpoint pollution program to provide money to States to address water pollution due to such causes as runoff from land. Nonpoint pollution is a major threat to coastal waters, and this bill would do much to boost support to States to attack this threat.

The bill raised the funding for pollution prevention and waste minimization to $19.6 million. As the sponsor in the authorizing committee of the pollution prevention legislation, I am pleased that we are increasing EPA's funding level for programs to prevent the creation of pollution.

We increase EPA's radon programs to $23.2 million. This pervasive threat continues to be a significant environmental problem, and we are providing funds to enhance our ability to address radon contamination.

We have also provided a $52 million increase for EPA's asbestos mitigation loans and grants program for school. Although the administration was content to ignore this program, Congress is not.

Another effort for which we provided increased funding of $2.5 million is oilspill assessment, monitoring, research, and prevention programs. As the recent spills have shown, we must do more to prevent spills from occurring and to deal with the problems they create.

As a continuation of our previous support for the development of a hazardous waste laboratory in Edison, NJ, the bill includes statutory authority for the New Jersey Institute of Technology to lease space from EPA for a joint university—EPA hazardous waste facility, previously funded through provisions in prior appropriations measures. This statutory language should clear the way for the project to move forward.

We have also continued support of $250,000 for a group of eight Northeastern States, including New Jersey and New York, for coordinated efforts to address interstate ozone and air pollution problems. Interstate transport of pollution is a problem for my State and the Nation, and I am hopeful that these coordinated efforts will help us achieve some progress on this problem.

Mr. President, this bill also includes several provisions aimed at assisting New Jersey veterans' facilities. The measure provides $10.7 million for renovations and improvements to the Lyons Veterans Hospital and $3.1 million for expansion of the clinic at the VAMC in East Orange.

Mr. President, I do want to express concern that the committee report does not specifically direct HUD to use $750,000 for continuation of the district heating and cooling program. I have been a supporter of that program for some time, and am hopeful that the conference committee will keep it alive. It is an important program and one that holds great promise for cities such as Camden, NJ.

I also want to express my support for funding that has been provided in this bill for NASA, and more specifically the ACTS Program and the space station. I am a strong supporter of the space program, which is so essential to our technological future. The ACTS Program and the space station are especially important components of our space program, and deserve continued support.

Also, I am pleased that funding is included for stratified charge rotary engine development.

Finally, I want to express my support for funding that has been included for the National Science Foundation—though I would have preferred a higher level. The NSF plays a vital role in supporting the vital scientific advances upon which our Nation depends.

Mr. President, on the whole, I believe this is a strong bill, and I am committed to working with the subcommittee chair and ranking minority member as we proceed to the conference with the House.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I rise as a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee to congratulate Senator MIKULSKI, Chairman of the VA, HUD, and Independent Agencies Subcommitee, on a job well done. Particularly, I would like to thank her for the vast amount of cooperation she has provided in working with me to insure that the needs of Washington State are met.

It is important to note that many people rely on the housing, medical, and environmental services encompassed by this bill. For instance, there will be $11.495 billion allocated to veterans medical delivery services. This represents a signficant increase over the administration's request. Over $15 billion has been provided for housing programs greatly enhancing the housing options of our most needy citizens. We have also passed an increase over the House budget for the space station project in the NASA budget.

As I previously stated, this bill does much to provide for the critical needs of the residents of Washington State.

First, I have worked closely with the Seattle Housing Authority to see that over $800,000 in additional funding and funding transfer authority be provided the authority for their efforts in antidrug and elderly service programs. As a close friend of this organization, I know that they will use these new resources in an effective manner to improve their residents' health, safety, and welfare.

I have also advocated and received funding for important environmental projects in the State. This includes $1 million for the Spokane Aquifer and full funding for the National Estuary Program, which includes cleanup and environmental maintenance dollars for Puget Sound.

Additionally, funds have been provided for the economic development and revitalization of Dayton, WA.

Mr. President, I am proud to have worked with the chairman of this subcommittee, Senator MIKULSKI. Passage of this bill would go a long way in assisting the homeless, our veterans, and people living in rural America.

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the pending business, H.R. 3072, the defense appropriations bill.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 3072) making appropriations for the Department of Defense for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1990, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is the second excepted committee amendment beginning on page 36, line 22, of the bill.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Alaska.

AMENDMENT NO. 886 TO EXCEPTED COMMITTEE AMENDMENT BEGINNING ON PAGE 36, LINE 22

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration. It is offered by Senator HEFLIN, myself, and others. It is Senator HEFLIN's amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alaska [Mr. STEVENS], for Mr. HEFLIN (for himself, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. SHELBY, Mr. WARNER, Mr. NUNN, Mr. WALLOP, Mr. DOLE, and Mr. BOND), proposes an amendment numbered 886 to excepted committee amendment beginning on page 36, line 22.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 37, line 2, strike the period, and add: ": Provided further, That of the funds appropriated in this Title, $4,301,904,000 shall be available only for the Strategic Defense Initiative: Provided further, That the Secretary of Defense shall provide the House and Senate Committees on Armed Services and Appropriations a revised Research, Development, Test and Evaluation Programs (R-1) exhibit reflecting all adjustments to programs in this title.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, this is a technical amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana, which is pending, that being the pending business now, but the Senator has not had an opportunity to explain his amendment. I would be pleased to withhold any comments on this amendment to his amendment until he has had a chance to explain his amendment. I do hope we could get an agreement from the distinguished manager of the bill so that we would vote on this amendment that is offered on behalf of Senator HEFLIN at 2:15.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Is the Senator making a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. STEVENS. The Senator from Hawaii is privileged to get the time agreement if he wishes to do so.

Mr. INOUYE. Does the Senator wish that I withhold?

Mr. JOHNSTON. For the time being.

Mr. President, parliamentary inquiry: Is the amendment offered by the Senator from Alaska on behalf of Mr. HEFLIN a first-degree amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a second-degree perfecting amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It is a second-degree amendment and, therefore, no longer amendable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Hawaii wishes to make a unanimous-consent request that the vote occur on the Heflin amendment at 2:15, I would have no objection.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote on the Heflin amendment occur at 2:15 this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, the Committee on Appropriations adopted an amendment which provides that the spending for directed-energy weapons within the SDI account not be less than the amount spent this past year. The amount spent last year was $820 million. So that the $820 million is less than 25 percent of the total SDI account.

The Strategic Defense Initiative Organization, the SDIO, has proposed to spend more than last year's amount; that is, they have proposed to spend $831 million. To be sure, that was out of a larger requested budget. Nevertheless, their plans as submitted to the Congress would spend more than my amendment would require. They would spend $831 million in their request. My amendment would require only $820 million.

Mr. President, there are those who say that this is a micromanagement amendment. To the contrary, it is not, Mr. President. It is a management directional amendment, to be sure, but not a micromanagement amendment. Because, if my colleagues will look through this bill and through this report, they will find that the management of every other account in the Department of Defense is much more detailed, much more precise, offers much more specific direction than our management of SDIO.

Indeed, Mr. President, President Reagan made a special exception for SDI, because in his dream to get the astrodome over the United States, he gave the SDI a special exemption from what we might call accounting accountability within the Department of Defense and gave them an exemption from what amounts to the usual oversight within the Department of Defense.

So, in fact, SDI today has much greater freedom, much greater flexibility much greater ability to put its resources in those places where it wishes than any other department of the Department of Defense. And the amendment which the Appropriations Committee adopted does not take that away.

What, Mr. President, is the purpose of an amendment which gives the SDIO the direction to do what they say they would, that is not to spend less this year than they did last year on directed-energy weapons? It is because this Congress has adopted what we might call a mandate, a goal for the strategic defense initiative, which is well explained by the following legislation, which has been adopted in the previous 2 years and, indeed, finds its way into the instant bill.

What we have said is that it is the sense of the Congress that:

The Strategic Defense Initiative should be a long-term and robust research program to provide the United States with expanded options for responding to a Soviet breakout from the 1972 Antiballistic Missile Treaty, and to respond to other future Soviet arms initiatives that might pose a grave threat to the United States' national security.

The resolution which is the governing legislation on SDI in the United States further says that:

Future research plans and budgets for SDI must be established using realistic projections of available resources in the overall defense budget, and must not undercut other important Department of Defense programs.

So, Mr. President, what our amendment does is to provide for the long-term robust research program that is specifically called for in the law. The problem, I tell my colleagues, is that this SDIO has indicated that they want to rush towards a phase I deployment decision by 1994. That is what General Monahan has stated in writing, in a letter to Senator WILSON. Their goal is to get a deployment decision on phase I by 1994.

In order to do that, Mr. President, they would have to shortchange the long-range objectives in order to get the short-range objective. The short-range objective is to get phase I deployed. Why is that a mistake, It is a mistake, first, Mr. President, because it is totally unachieveable and would, in effect, break the bank.

As our resolution, the blueprint that we, the Congress—and which was signed into law by the President—have proposed for SDI says:

Budgets for SDI must be established using realistic projections of available resources in the overall defense budget and must not undercut other important Department of Defense programs.

In order to reach that 1994 deployment decision, Mr. President, it requires, according to the budget submissions of the SDIO, that spending rise from present levels—last year it was $3.7 billion for SDI—that it rise from that to $9 billion by 1994. In other words, to reach this goal we almost have to triple spending for SDI between fiscal year 1990 and fiscal year 1994.

Mr. President, if that does not violate the blueprint and constitute a dream as figmentized as the old astrodome concept of SDI, then I do not know what is dreaming and what is not dreaming. It is totally unrealistic.

But, in order to try to do that, Mr. President, whether they get the $9 billion or not—and I can tell my colleagues they will not get the $9 billion. Where is it going to come from? Are we going to cancel everything else in the defense budget in order to fund SDI? I think not, Mr. President.

So, where are they going to get it from? They would get it from the long-range directed energy weapons; those weapons that would be necessary in phases II and III of the strategic defense initiative.

What is this all about, phases I, II, and III? Mr. President, they have not been very well defined. The only definition we have of phase I is a requirement of the Joint Chiefs of Staff which defines the requirement of phase I, not in terms of the kind of architecture, the kinds of weapons or the kinds of devices of which it would be made, but rather it defines it in terms of the number of warheads which it would be required to shoot down in any given time.

It happens that the number of warheads works out to be 16 percent of total Soviet warheads. So in order to get phase I, we need to be able to knock out 16 percent of the number of Soviet warheads which is now, I guess over 10,000. Part of it is a definitional problem about what are ICBM's and what constitutes strategic warheads. But I would say probably a figure of 11,000 would be a good one. But use the lower figure, 10,000 Soviet warheads.

That means if we financed and put into operation phase I without anything else, it would mean that the United States would only be subject to 8,400 Soviet warheads because SDI, phase I, would knock out the first 1,600.

That is, if we meet the definition and requirement of phase I.

We say, well, is that what this is all about, knocking out 1,600 warheads? And SDI would say: No; it is not. Because this is a phased deployment. First, we have phase I and simultaneously with developing phase I we are working on phase II. Because we have to have phase II, otherwise phase I does not make any sense.

I asked General Monahan about this at our hearings. I asked him this. I said:

> All the testimony from people like General Abrahamson, General Herres, and the others that it would not be feasible or proper to deploy phase I without some degree of confidence in phase II and phase III because of the degradation that everyone predicts for phase I; isn't that correct?

General Monahan said: "I agree. Yes, sir, that's true."

In effect, what General Monahan was saying was this, that phase I, which gets only about 1,600 Soviet warheads, the technology for that degrades. That is, the Soviets can find a way around that phase I very easily, or relatively easier over time, and therefore we must be ready with phase II and phase III, those phases being, as yet, undefined.

Mr. President, how do we get around phase I? The obvious, easiest way is to build more warheads.

If it is going to take out 1,600 warheads, then you add 1,600 to the inventory and you have ipso facto canceled out phase I because these are in phase I what we call kinetic kill weapons. They are literally orbiting rockets of some measure. We have not defined what kind of rockets, whether they would be Brilliant Pebbles or another kind of space-based interceptor. They would knock them out and, by definition, if you are going to count on something knocking something else down, it can do so only one time. It is not like a beam weapon which can shoot innumerable beams, if one weapon knocks down one warhead, if it works, so that obviously you get around phase I by building more warheads or by a number of other devices which are not here pertinent.

Suffice it to say the director of the SDIO in his testimony—I think this was a couple of months ago, May 11—stated that phase I degrades very rapidly. So if phase I degrades very rapidly and if you must simultaneously work on phase II and phase III, then the question is, what is phase II and phase III and how much should you be prepared for? Mr. President, phase II and phase III, in terms of architecture, are also very unclear, but one thing is virtually certain, and that is that phase II and phase III would involve some kind of directed energy weapon.

The kind of directed energy weapons we are talking about are probably some kind of laser or a neutral particle beam which is another kind of directed energy weapon that has some other special characteristics. It can shoot through a surface and destroy the inside of a weapon and all its mechanisms without actually having to fracture the outside of the weapon.

In any event, directed energy weapons are essential in order to have a phase II and a phase III. The problem with directed energy weapons is that they are slower in development. They travel at the speed of light; they have the ability to have what we call interactive discrimination, to discriminate between those warheads that are real and those which are drones or fakes or decoys, and it would be a much more flexible lethal weapon if it could work and be developed, but most would say that that would not be developed until perhaps the next century. Early in the next century we hope or SDI might have some hope that it would be available sooner. Clearly, it could not be developed for a 1994 deployment decision date for phase I.

So, Mr. President, if the SDIO took the money away from these directed energy weapons in order to build it into phase I, then we would be making a fateful decision. If it all worked out and which it would not for reasons which I have explained, if it all worked out, we would be getting into phase I which degrades rapidly, which the Soviet Union could defeat, which leaves room for a minimum of 8,400 warheads coming into the United States. Talk about your nonleak approved astrodome, phase I leaks through, at least by definition, 8,400 warheads, probably more like 9,000 warheads. So does that make you feel safer at night? Does that do away with the doctrine of mutually assured destruction? Not at all. It hardly makes a whit of difference in that calculation, Mr. President. All it does is spend between $100 and $200 billion which the Soviets could defeat with a fraction of that expenditure and, in the process, we break the ABM Treaty and launch into new spending rates.

Mr. President, if we are going to do that, we ought to at least be ready with what General Monahan himself says is necessary. He says you have to have a simultaneous development of phase II and phase III while you are developing phase I, while you are building or researching or attempting to deploy, determining if Brilliant Pebbles works, you also have to be doing your beam weapons because if you are going to go from more than 16 percent lethality against Soviet warheads, it has to involve the beam weapons. He has also said that. By the way, it costs a lot of money. I asked him this: "So we're talking about at least a doubling of the number of dollars that would be spent during phase I for things that are not related to phase I."

General Monahan states: "I don't know if it's double, or exactly where. But it is more, there is no question about that. We would have to spend dollars for the technical work that supports both phase I and phase II, and then, of course, development work for phase III."

So it is very clear and it is not subject to disagreement, Mr. President, that you must spend money on phase II and phase III in order to make a sensible decision to deploy phase I.

All the amendment of the committee does is guarantee that we not mortgage the future of phase II and phase III in order to rush to a deployment decision for phase I. It is not an attempt to defeat the strategic defense initiative. It is not an attempt to undermine the force of the strategic defense initiative. Quite to the contrary, Mr. President. It means that if we are ever to deploy the strategic defense initiative, we should do so as the Congress has stated, as all the experts agree, in a phased way that when phase I is beginning to be deployed, we know we have the technology for phase II and can look forward with some degree of confidence to phase II actually being deployed and working.

So that is what this is all about, Mr. President; a way to make SDI a sensible program.

One final word before I turn it over to my friend from Alaska who will explain his second-degree amendment to my amendment. A number of my colleagues have said during debate that I have been an opponent of SDI. It is perfectly true, Mr. President, that I have had a whole series of amendments over a period of years to bring the spending levels of SDI down to levels that did not cannibalize everything else in the Department of Defense. It is true, Mr. President, that I have felt that the administration's request in SDI was too much. It is also true, Mr. President, that I have stated repeatedly that I had signed on to the mandate, to the resolution as adopted by the Congress, authored by the Senator from Alaska, Senator STEVENS, which does state what the goal of SDI is: A long-term and robust research program. And, indeed, I stood on this floor as the acting manager of the Defense appropriations bill last year and added $250 million to the SDI account on my amendment because I felt at that time that the level of SDI was not sufficient to achieve these goals, considering the legislative posture of the legislation at that time.

That continues to be the goal of this Senator. Not to abolish SDI at all, but to make a program that is sensible and affordable, to grant to this country what we in the Congress have said we wanted: The ability to provide for expanded options for responding to a Soviet breakout from the 1972 ABM Treaty and of future Soviet arms initiatives which might pose a grave threat to the United States.

That ought to be our goal. That is our stated goal. That is the legislation which has been adopted as the blueprint by this country. We ought to adhere to that, and that is what the Appropriations Committee amendment does.

I yield the floor.

Mr. WARNER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHELBY). The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I have just come from another session of the conference between the House and the Senate on the respective authorization bills. The SDI figure is literally the pivotal decisions around which all other decisions at this time are evolving.

I am pleased that our distinguished colleague from Louisiana has brought up this amendment and that once again this body can direct its attention to it, because the decision on this amendment will have a profound impact on the outcome of the conference between the House and Senate on the authorization bills.

The negotiations at this point—and momentarily I will be joined by the chairman of the Armed Services Committee and we will engage in a colloquy on this issue—between the House and the Senate on the authorization bill historically, traditionally, and otherwise should focus on the numbers reached by each of those bodies on the SDI account, but the House is quite clearly taking a tact that they are going to deal with the numbers that were reached by the two Appropriations Committees.

As the record reflects, the House Appropriations and Armed Services Committees have funded SDI at $2.8 billion for the Department of Defense. The Senate Armed Services Committee at this time, with the support of this body—and I might add after considerable debate—funded SDI at $3.7 billion. The Senate Appropriations Committee has marked SDI at $4.3 billion.

I am going to wait for the chairman to join me on the floor, but I want to impress upon the Members of this body the importance of the decision they are about to make on this amendment, because it will have a profound impact on the decisions we are endeavoring to resolve, and in a timely fashion it is essential I believe that the Armed Services conference report a bill to both bodies such that the valuable work by these committees over the past 7 months can be considered in the context of the appropriations bill.

Mr. President, I will suggest the absence of a quorum until such time as the chairman of the Armed Services Committee joins me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I will go ahead and use this time to talk about the amendment. I thought perhaps Senator STEVENS wanted to explain the amendment first. Let me use this time quickly to do so.

Mr. President, we had a first-class debate night before last on SDI funding levels. An amendment was proposed to raise the funding level on SDI from $3.7 billion to $4 billion, a $300 million increase. There were, to be sure, other parts of that amendment. However, the linchpin of that amendment I think was the SDI funding level. It was debated as such. The debate on that issue took up the majority of time. The Senate resoundingly, Mr. President, by a margin of almost 2 to 1, beat that amendment. So now here we are two nights later saying the Senate might have beaten back an increase of $300 million by a margin of 2 to 1, so now we are going to try to double the amount of increase to $600 million and add that on to SDI.

We are told, Mr. President, we do not expect to get it, that this is only a bargaining chip.

We keep hearing this bargaining chip business, but I think the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIXON] put it very well the other night when he said, "It is a complete absolute waste of time to try to increase spending for SDI in light of House opposition."

Mr. President, Members of Congress know about this program now. We have appropriated some $20 billion, including that which is in this bill this year. The Congress has reined in this political jargon as it has been described about this astrodome over the United States. It took us $20 billion to find out that it was not realistic. Of course, we are told now that we never did believe that. It was only political jargon.

The President just the other day said, "The original broad, idealistic, wonderfully idealistic proposal of the impenetrable shield has been abandoned."

Catch this language, Mr. President. The President of the United States talks about this astrodome idea as a "wonderfully idealistic proposal of the impenetrable shield."

Mr. President, on this floor, we were subjected to month after month of propaganda, to cartoons, to this huge propaganda proposal, experiments, attenuated by a great deal of hype and now we are told that was wonderfully idealistic. Wonderfully idealistic. That is matched by the Vice President who says it was political jargon. And now we are told, well, nobody believed it anyway.

If they did not believe it, why did they try to fund it as such? If they did not believe it, why did they tell us that they believed it? We were told on the floor of this Senate—Mr. President, I have stood here hour after hour on SDI and debated that question of the impenetrable shield, and that was the hope. There are probably still some in this body who say, yes, we can make an impenetrable shield, maybe not this year but it is out there in the future somewhere. Indeed, some members of the administration, the Secretary of State, is still talking about the impenetrable shield.

So let us talk about something realistic. That is what the Appropriations Committee is doing, something realistic. I submit, Mr. President, to try to double the increase in SDI that we defeated by a 2-to-1 margin the other night is just that kind of wonderful political jargon to which we have been subjected time after time.

We are not, in my judgment, spending enough on research and development in other parts of the armed services. The account which we call the tech base, which is basically basic research in areas like DARPA, the Defense reseach agency, is down to $3.6 billion.

It is all we spend on our tech base. That is in all of the services. The R&D budget is, of course, much higher than that. Indeed the R&D budget is $38 billion. But, of course, the R&D budget is a little bit misleading because most of the R&D budget is on weapons-specific research.

For example, there is the huge R&D component on the B-2 Stealth bomber. It is already in being but that is R&D which flies the plane, tests the equipment, and it is hundreds of millions of dollars in scope for a weapons system already in being. The same is true for the B-1 bomber. The same is true for many, many other weapons systems; in fact most weapons systems that we have.

Basic research or the so-called tech base is only $3.6 billion. That is probably the fund from which this $600 million would come, or at least we do not know where it would come from. It would come from somewhere in research. But I guess tech base would be part of that.

Mr. President, that is wrong. We need basic research in our Armed Forces to talk about where tomorrow's weapons are going to come from, and we should not sacrifice that in order to increase SDI.

Mr. President, there is another place where it may come from. When you talk about going to conference and getting leverage in the conference committee, what I fear is if we adopted this amendment, and we had to take R&D money the House would take the R&D money away from the Midgetman because they already stated they want to cancel the Midgetman, and they have also stated they want to cut back and indeed they have adopted figures which cut back on the rail-mobile MX. I believe that the House would like to cancel both of those weapons systems.

So in terms of bargaining in the conference committee in order to give the Armed Services Committee something they regard as a bargaining chip in their conference, we go in the Appropriations Committee losing the bargaining power on Midgetman and on rail mobile.

So what is sought to be obtained by the Armed Services Committee on the one hand would be taken away by the Appropriations Committee with the other hand. I can tell my friends on the Armed Services Committee if they want a higher level in SDI, the way to do it is hold for a higher number. There can be no conference agreement in armed services without this agreement. If they think anything less than $3.7 billion is too low for SDI, hold out. We have adopted the $3.7 billion level.

But to come in at this time and double the amount of increase which was defeated by this body 2 nights ago by a 2-to-1 margin, I think, is unrealistic, it is unwise, and would take away from the Appropriations Committee the bargaining leverage which it needs.

Mr. WARNER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. Once again, I will endeavor to invite my distinguished colleague, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, to join me on the floor and lay before the Senate our perspectives on the direction in which the conference between the House and the Senate on the authorization bill is now taking and how this decision on SDI is progressing.

Once again, to refresh the recollection of our colleagues, the Senate Armed Services Committee reached a figure of $4.3 billion; the House Armed Services Committee $2.8 billion; the House Appropriations Committee coincidentally, came in at the same figure, $2.8 billion, and, of course, the Senate Appropriations Committee at $3.7 billion.

The difficulty we are having in our conference is that the focus of attention is not on the figures arrived at by the authorization committees but the figures as arrived at by the Appropriations Committees thereby leaving us with what I regard as an untenable position in terms of our conference.

At this point, I would like to invite the attention of my distinguished chairman to provide me with his views because, as I said, this decision is going to control the outcome in many respects of the conference we are now in on the authorization bill.

There has been considerable discussion respecting the issue raised by the Senator from Louisiana; namely, the advisability of earmarking certain percentages of these funds for a category which he feels very strongly about, and that to me is the subsidiary issue which possibly could be resolved if we could get support for increasing the dollar value of the figure we are working on in the conference between the House and Senate on the Armed Services Committees.

Mr. President, it appears to this Senator that more time is needed for private consultation. Therefore, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I see Senator NUNN has joined us. We have discussed this matter many times. I state to my colleague from Georgia that I have given the Senate the full figures and indicated that our conference is now waiting for a decision on this amendment, because it is pivotal to many decisions that we are about to make in our conference, and that the drift, as this Senator from Virginia views it, is that the conference on the House side is focusing only on the SDI numbers as reached by the two Appropriations Committees of the House and Senate; leaving us, namely, the Senate, which has strongly supported the higher figure, in somewhat of a difficult position.

I invite the observations of my distinguished chairman.

Mr. NUNN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I rise in support of the pending amendment, and the Senator from Virginia has basically stated the case accurately. What we have here is a novel situation, and only in America, only in the Senate, only in this kind of Government can we reach these kind of dilemmas. Of course, this is the positive side of our system, as well as sometimes the frustrating side.

What we have here are two different sets of negotiations going on. We have the Appropriations Committee that has reported out this bill that we have before us in the Senate. We have the House appropriations bill that has already passed, a bill that is waiting to go to conference, and in addition to that set of negotiations, which will soon take place—hopefully the Senator from Hawaii will be able to get this bill passed today or tomorrow—we have the House and Senate authorization committees that are in conference and have been in conference for several weeks.

We are here on the same things. We are here in our conference, and we just met a few minutes ago; we met yesterday and we met over and over again. We are trying to solve the strategic issues, strategic programs. That includes the two missiles, the Midgetman and the MX rail mobile, and the B-2 and the strategic defense initiative.

I believe that the Senator from Louisiana has made a number of valid points about SDI. I am not a cheerleader for SDI, and I never have been. I have always voted to cut some of the program from the administration's request, but I also felt it was a valuable resource program, and I have also felt—and we have never succeeded in this, and I hope that the options are still open—that the way that the administration really should look at this program is not only as a long-term research program, but a buffer against the Soviet breakout in this area. And they are doing their own research.

I have always hoped that we would get some people over in the Pentagon and SDI and in the White House, to take a look at a system that would not be a defense against a massive attack, but a defense against a lesser attack, whether by accident or by some form of unauthorized launch.

It seems to me that is the kind of system that really would be stabilizing. That is an argument for another day.

SDI funding is important for a number of reasons, including, but not limited to, arms control. There are valid programmatic reasons. Whatever one's view is of SDI, and there are many different views, we put an enormous amount of time and effort into it.

If we are going to phase into a different direction—and I believe the administration is at a juncture where they are going to have to rethink some of the basic premises of SDI—the support in this body and the support in the House is clearly eroding, no doubt about that. I think they are going to have to do that between now and early next year. I do not think they have 2 or 3 more years.

I think they are going to have to take a hard look at SDI as to what they really want, and decide on the goals. If they do not know the goals and cannot state them clearly, then it is very hard to sell the program on Capitol Hill.

The Vice President made some statements the other day that I found encouraging. He basically talked about a system that would be, as I viewed what he said to the Los Angeles Times, less than a masked attack system, but more designed along the line of an ALP's system.

I think the administration has to get its own act together and state the goals of SDI with some clarity, and clearly the time is running out. Where are we now? In this bill we have a level of SDI spending of $3.7 billion. That is $600 million less than passed in the authorization bill.

This is not a jurisdictional question. The Appropriations Committee has every right to make cuts in not only this program but any other program. Our authorization bill is a ceiling, not a floor. This has nothing to do with jurisdiction whatsoever.

In the Senate authorization conference, we are being confronted with House conferees who are unwilling to look at our $4.3 billion as a negotiating point. They are instead taking the $3.7 billion that is in the Senate appropriations bill that is on the floor, and they are saying to us, not only did the appropriations come up with that number, but also the Senate of the United States, the other night, ratified that number by an overwhelming vote.

So they are saying, "We are not going to negotiate between 4.3 and 2.8. We are going to negotiate between 3.7 and 2.8." Where does that leave us? It leaves us in a situation where we can sit there until Thanksgiving in an authorization conference—and maybe we will do that—and say we do not want to deal, we do not have to agree with them; or it leaves us in a position, if we really want to go ahead and finish our conference, of giving some guidance to the appropriators, and finishing particularly the strategic issues, which include the two missiles. The administration has a lot of decisions to make on that that directly impact the START talks, so they need to know where Congress is going to go on those two missile programs.

It is very important that they know where we are going to go on the B-2. I do not think we should wait until Thanksgiving—we cannot—but if we are going to have a chance to come out of this with approximately last year's level of SDI spending or maybe slightly below, if we are going to come out of it somewhere in the 3.6-to-3.8 range in terms of the Department of Defense SDI funding, I am convinced there is only one way to do it; and that is to send a signal to the House conferees, both authorization and indeed Appropriations, that we want to come out at about that level. If we leave it like it is right now, there is no way we can come out at that level.

What has happened, I think, the Appropriations Committee—and I understand this; all of us are searching for funds, and it is very difficult to find them. I think the appropriators, our very fine Appropriations Committee, in their 3.7 number, have basically anticipated the outcome of the authorization conference, saying that the House is 2.8; the Senate is 4.3; let us go down to 3.7, because that is where that gang is going to come out anyway.

What has happened? The authorization conferees on the House side are anticipating the outcome of the appropriation conference, saying that they are at 2.8, and the Senate is at 3.7. Let us split the difference, and that will be 3.2. So what we have are three things: We have an erosion of support for SDI, no doubt about that. We have a lack of clarity in the program, a lack of definitive goals.

In addition to that, we have a strange kind of conference going on between two different bodies' committees, and it is having a ratcheting down effect. I do not know whether the Senate wants to come out at 3.2 or not.

But in a few minutes what we are going to be voting on in effect—they will not write it up in the history books this way; maybe it will not be reported in Current Events this way—but in effect what we are going to be voting on is whether you want to come out with SDI at about 3.25 or 3.3, which is what we are going to do if you leave it like it is now and that is going to be about a $600 million cut from last year, if you want to cut SDI $600 million from last year or essentially freeze SDI to last year's spending. That is what it amounts to in pragmatic terms. You want to freeze it to 3.6 or 3.7, and then we are going to have to add back this number.

There is the third choice and that is to still be negotiating this around Thanksgiving Day and maybe even the middle of December.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NUNN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I understand what my dear friend from Georgia is saying. But I am sure he recalls the first-class debate we had here on this floor when the authorization bill was up and I offered an amendment to bring down the level of SDI funding which was $4.3 billion in the authorization bill, and we had a really big debate. I pointed out that was too big an increase, that we should not be giving that big amount to SDI, given the scarce resources, and the Senator from Georgia, as I remember, and the Senator from Nebraska, said, "Look, unless we have this money we are going to go to conference and we are going to get this lower figure."

So the Senate, by a 50-47 margin, said, in effect, to the Senator from Georgia, "OK, here is your $4.3 billion; go to conference and get a reasonable figure."

Now we are told that all that was not so, that the Senate conferees on the armed services bill are in effect being led around like a horse with a ring in his nose because the House conferees now are ignoring the Senate-passed figure on the authorization bill.

Mr. NUNN. If that is a question, I say to my friend from Louisiana the appropriators have put the ring in our nose. It is not the House.

Mr. JOHNSTON. How many times do we have to give these astronomical figures in order to give you the bargaining chip you need?

Mr. NUNN. Just keep the figures the same. We are asking about the same amount of money we asked for when we came through here on the authorization bill.

What the appropriation number does before we get through our conference you have basically cut out any negotiating position we have. I know it was inadvertent. I know it was not intended by most people.

The Senator from Louisiana has a devious expression. Maybe he intended this.

But, nevertheless, I do not think most people really wanted to cut SDI by $600 million from last year's level. Maybe they did. We will have a vote in a few minutes to determine that because this vote in practical effect will determine whether you want to virtually freeze SDI at last year's level, no inflation, no program growth, or whether you want to have a very big cut. It is the only way we are going to be able to get it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I think again in answer to my friend, why cannot he go in the conference and tell the House conferees what he told us on the floor, that is, that he has 4.3 and the House conferees split the difference?

Mr. NUNN. I have attempted that, and the Senator from Nebraska has attempted this over and over again. He has been in there negotiating. He heads up our strategic panel. Time after time we met with them and basically told them that and frankly they say, "Well, look at what your Appropriations Committee does, the 4.3 is phantom, it is gone, it does not mean anything, it is no longer relevant. That is why."

Maybe the Senator from Louisiana can go in with us and tell them they ought to split the difference and come out and help us out on that. We would be happy to have him as a guest at our conference, and when he does that maybe he can tell them how the appropriators really intend this to come out at 3.6 or 3.7, and that would be a big help. Short of that we are going to have a hard time reaching agreement.

Frankly, I do not know how the Senator from Nebraska feels about it, but I am willing to be patient for a long time.

If we are going to have a clear direction for our country in terms of the missile program, I do not believe we are going to clarify SDI in the next 30 days no matter what, but on the missile programs I think it is very important. There are a lot of arms control considerations that go into the question whether we have two missiles or no missiles. I think it is important we move on.

Frankly, I say to my friend from Louisiana, the appropriators are very skillful in the conference; no doubt about that. The Senator from Hawaii has vast experience, and the Senator from Alaska, but I do believe it would be helpful to them if our authorization committee can make a settlement on SDI, on the two missiles and on the B-2 before they start struggling with it next week.

It may be that the House appropriators will cave in to you and you will bowl them over, but on our conferences it is a little tougher than that. If we can be of help today, I think this will unlock a lot in the defense arena.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Could I ask the Senator one more question?

Mr. NUNN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Is it not true in the last 4 years you have not always split the difference on SDI? To the contrary, in 1988, the split was Senate-House 54-46, in 1987 it was 48-52, in 1988 it was——

Mr. NUNN. Which way?

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senate is the first number. That is the percentage of difference.

Mr. NUNN. First more than 50 percent, second year less; is that right?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, 54 percent the first year, the next year 48 percent, the next year 59 percent, and the next year 51 percent, which means that it makes the obvious point that——

Mr. NUNN. We are good negotiators.

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is right, and you do not always split the difference. If you do split the difference, you come out where you say you ought to. You already have that. We already did it for you. We had a big debate, and by a close margin we did it for you. Now we have to do it again but not on the authorization bill, on the appropriations bill.

Mr. NUNN. Could I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes.

Mr. NUNN. What number does he want to come out with on DOD? I cannot remember. What is the number the Senator from Louisiana wants? Does he want to come out with 3.7, which is his position on this bill or, does he want to come out around 3.2?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I have been in enough conferences to know that the best way to go into conference is not to have your exact figure trotted out in advance.

If the Senator is asking about 3.2, I think 3.2 is too low. I would urge the Senator in his authorization conference not to go to 3.2.

Mr. NUNN. The Senator ought to vote for this amendment then. He should vote for this amendment because what happens if we come out with 3.2 in the authorization, then if you go by our bill as the ceiling, no matter what you think is the right number, you are not going to come up with 3.2. So we are in a practical situation and I believe it has to be acknowledged and taken into account.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I do think it is a very difficult position for those of us who are asked to manage appropriations bills to deal with items such as this without an agreement from the authorizing committee because we really do get whipsawed.

This is a classic example of the Senate being asked to pass on an appropriations bill before the authorizing conference is over.

The statement of the Senator from Georgia is exactly correct, as I understand it. We anticipated in the appropriations process the outcome of negotiation between the Senate bill with an authorized level of $4.3 billion and the House bill with an authorization level of $2.8 billion and we funded that approximately on the average of the past settlements between the House and Senate in the authorizing process, and we settled on $3.7 billion.

If you want to look at it as a freeze in SDI, it is keeping the same level with almost a factor for inflation, not quite total, because there is a very high level of inflation when you are dealing with this esoteric research.

But as a practical matter we could, I think, honestly state that the $3.7 billion in the program for SDI would be substantially the same as 1989.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, the Senator has said that the committee took the $3.7 billion as averaging these things and as if it were some kind of compromise figure.

Mr. STEVENS. Between the authorizations bill is what I said.

Mr. JOHNSTON. He is not talking about the appropriations bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I am talking about the appropriation level as being anticipation of the compromise between the two authorizing committees.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I would beg to disagree, and I will ask my friend if in fact we did not have a letter signed by a majority of the members of the committee setting the level at $3.7 billion. We had the votes. It was not averaging. We had the votes. Is that not correct?

Mr. STEVENS. The figure was reached by the process I just mentioned. It was reached by anticipating what the authorizers would come out at. We did not pick that figure out of the air.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I would suggest to my friend that he was not part of the majority, that the majority had the figure set at 3.7, and I think that those who wanted to have a higher level, and I thought that included the Senator from Alaska, they recognized they did not have the votes. Is that not right?

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know what world the Senator from Louisiana has been working in. I am talking about what went on in the Subcommittee on Defense in terms of the figure of the Senator from Hawaii when it was presented. This Senator looked at it and said, that is true; that is the maximum we can anticipate would come out of the authorization conference, and if it came out it would be a level of what amounts to a freeze on the 1989 expenditure rate.

I hope the Senator from Louisiana realizes we look at situations like that, and I think he has too, in terms of the appropriations process, when we do not have an authorization bill.

This Senator wants to fund the amount of the authorization process on SDI, I go back to what the Senator from Georgia has said. Those of us who spent a great deal of time trying to act as Senate observers to the arms control negotiations know full well what SDI means in that total spectrum of the negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union on arms control and even in the conventional field.

SDI is the one item, I would say to the Senate, that the Soviet negotiators have mentioned to this Senator personally more than any other subject in connection with this ongoing negotiation. As such, it is the centerpiece of the negotiation. If we change it, we, in effect, undermine the negotiating capability of the executive branch. We will send a signal to the Soviets which I believe is wrong.

Under the circumstances, we thought we were funding what would come out of the negotiations on the authorizing bill. We were told, and it was graphically demonstrated to us last night by the Senator from Georgia as he showed the dilemma they face, the dilemma they face is that the House authorizing committee is looking to the level of the compromise figure that is in the appropriations bill and not looking at the action of the Senate when it voted on July 27 to sustain the level of 4.3.

All we are saying is, for the purpose of this bill going into conference, we ought to be in the same position as the authorizers are for the Senate of saying to the House, the level the Senate has approved, approved it on July 27 of this year, is $4.3 billion. That is all this amendment does.

In doing so, it says to the Secretary of Defense, we want you to fund the authorized level. Should it happen that the authorizers come out above 3.7, which I cannot anticipate, but if they do, this amendment would cover that emergency also.

I would say to my friend, to get beyond that, the Senator from Louisiana will recall that in committee I opposed the basic pending committee amendment. I did so because of the fact that it assumes that the level of funding for defense on SDI will be 3.7 or better. If it is not, the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana would earmark more moneys for directed energy research than is warranted by history in terms of the operation of this program.

If the amendment that has been offered now to the pending amendment, the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana, is adopted, then the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana makes eminent good sense. It says from the 4.3, we expect no less to be allocated to directed energy than has been made available in 1989 for directed energy. And I certainly would not oppose the pending amendment if this amendment in the second degree to his amendment is adopted. Because I would join the Senator from Louisiana in saying directed energy should get no less from their amount in 1990, if it is at least equal to 1989 or better.

Now that is what we are saying to the Senator from Louisiana. I am, frankly, surprised that from a point of view of a negotiating tactic with the House—and that is what it is. We are baring our soul here in saying this is the way we have to deal with numbers. This is not a matter of principle. It is a matter of numbers now. And we are negotiating to try and get the numbers that will sustain the level of directed energy the Senator from Louisiana wants. And his amendment was adopted by the committee on the basis of a $3.7 billion allocation which we now know is not possible to achieve unless the negotiators at the authorizing level are able to tell the House the Senate's position is 4.3, period.

Mr. JOHNSON addressed the Chair.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the Senator seek to ask me a question or seek the floor?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I seek the floor briefly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, my dear friend from Alaska has painted the picture in the Appropriations Committee as if we anticipated a split, as if we really wanted 4.3 but sort of as a compromise went to 3.7.

Mr. STEVENS. If the Senator would yield, and I did yield to him. That is not what I said. We set a level of 3.7 and the committee adopted the Senator from Louisiana's earmarking of directed energy on that basis. I was arguing in the committee that we could not assume we would hold the 3.7 and, therefore, his amendment earmarking the same amount in 1990 that was spent in 1989 on directed energy was premature and I opposed it.

We are now saying to the Senator if he will let us go to the House to negotiate on both the authorization bill and the appropriations bill at the $4.3 billion, his amendment makes sense and probably will result in at least $3.7 billion being allocated to SDI or at least a continuation at the level, in which event, I would not argue with the Senator's amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, the answer to the Senator's question, if that was a question, is yes and no.

Mr. President, just to set the record straight, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of a letter addressed to the chairman of the subcommittee, Senator INOUYE, and signed by 13 Senators, which says, among other things, "To mark SDI to $4.3 billion now would needlessly constrict the subcommittee on other programs." The 13 Senators, together with 2 others who thought the 3.7 level requested was too high, that is, Senator HATFIELD and Senator LEAHY, constituted a majority of the Appropriations Committee. I ask unanimous consent that that letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
Washington, DC, September 5, 1989.

Sen. DANIEL K. INOUYE,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Defense, Committee on Appropriations, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN INOUYE: As the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee soon will mark up the FY 1990 defense bill, we want to assure you of our cooperation in fashioning that legislation. We particularly appreciate the difficulty of meeting the agreed upon limits on defense budget outlays for FY 1990.

In this regard we understand that when the Subcommittee marks up the Appropriations bill, the DOD Authorization conference may not yet be complete on many items, including the Strategic Defense Initiative. In the absence of that information, we would strongly encourage you not to mark SDI to the SASC reported level of $4.3 billion, as everyone, including the SASC itself, anticipates a lower number from the conference.

To mark SDI to $4.3 billion now would needlessly constrict the Subcommittee on other programs. If the SDI conference agreement is unknown, and you don't intend to anticipate the outcome of the Conference by splitting the difference between the House and Senate authorization levels, then we strongly encourage you to mark to no more than last year's SDI funding level plus inflation.

Last year, and the year before, the following language was reported by the Committee and thereafter enacted as a sense of the Congress resolution:

". . . (4) in matching research priorities against available resources, the primary emphasis of SDI should be to explore promising new technologies, such as directed energy technologies, which might have long-term potential to defend against a responsive Soviet offensive threat."

Mr. Chairman, SDIO is apparently not complying with this Congressional direction. If they received their full budget request, about $2 billion more than the actual FY 1986 appropriation, SDIO would spend less in real terms in FY 1990 on directed energy weapons that they did in FY 1986, FY 1987, FY 1988, or FY 1989. During those years, although SDIO enjoyed massive funding increases overall, the funding it allocated to directed energy weapons—the lasers and energy beams of the future that we were led to believe were synonomous with SDI—generally declined in real terms.

Instead, SDIO concedes, the emphasis is on obtaining a deployment decision by the President within the next four years. And the focus for such a decision is on the near-term kinetic kill technologies of Phase I and in particular, the so-called "Brilliant Pebbles". Yet, with all this emphasis on "Brilliant Pebbles", SDIO won't decide until November, well after the Appropriations bill is enacted, whether Brilliant Pebbles is worth incorporating into the Phase I architecture. As you know, neither Brilliant Pebbles nor any other space-based kinetic energy weapon in Phase I is considered to have had "long-term potential to defend against a responsive Soviet offensive threat".

The SDIO Director has indicated he will further reduce funding of Directed Energy and Advanced Technology programs, if Congress does not provide SDIO the billion-dollar budget increase it requested overall. Mr. Chairman, we urge you to prevent further loss of balance in the program between the expedient near-term technologies and those technologies with long-term potential. One way might be to establish a minimum funding level for Directed Energy Weapons at the current level.

We thank you for your attention to our request and look forward to working with you on the defense appropriations bill.

Sincerely,

Dennis DeConcini, Bob Kerrey, Brock Adams, J. Bennett Johnston, Tom

Harkin, Harry Reid, Barbara A. Mikulski, Dale Bumpers, Frank R. Lautenberg, Wyche Fowler, Jr., Quentin N. Burdick, Charles E. Grassley, Jim Sasser, U.S. Senators.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Those Senators on that letter, together with Senators HATFIELD and LEAHY who thought the 3.7 was too high, together with other Senators who did not sign the letter, but who voted for the level, constituted a big margin in the Appropriations Committee. And as that letter indicated, we knew precisely what we were doing. We thought $4.3 billion was too high and $3.7 billion was overwhelmingly adopted.

Mr. President, I will yield in just a moment to my friend from Nebraska, but let me just make this point. We have already given the Armed Services Committees the number they need which they said they needed as a bargaining chip. They said we need to split the difference and come back at about 3.7, I recall the Senator from Nebraska said.

Mr. President, we are told that that was a meaningless gesture, that we have got to do it on the appropriation bill as well.

Mr. President, this assumes that the House is both weak willed and weakminded, that somehow the House will not be aware of what is going on here. When our friends from the Armed Services Committee say we want you to give us 4.3 again, but we really do not mean 4.3, I do not know what they mean, something less—then just how weakminded is the House supposed to be? Why is this second statement of 4.3, if you do not mean it, why is that any more meaningful than the first 4.3 which apparently they did not mean?

Mr. President, bargaining chips, in the first place, is a little bit of a silly process. But if that is in fact the process, then use what you already have. Do not constrict the Appropriations Committee. Because by taking the 4.3, you restrict the Appropriations Committee's ability in other areas, such as Midgetman, such as the V-22, such as the rail mobile MX, such as all the other weapons programs that we have included in research and development in our bill.

I simply say, Mr. President, the Armed Services Committee has all the bargaining chips they need. They have $4.3 billion, if that is what they want, already in their bill.

To close, Mr. President, I think the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN], put it very well, if he was correctly quoted by the Wall Street Journal.

On September 27, the Wall Street Journal said, quoting Senator NUNN:

"SDI is a perishable commodity, and it is going downhill on both sides of Congress," said Armed Services Committee Chairman SAM NUNN, who backed the restoration of funds but said he hadn't crafted the specific amendment. "It's a big pot of money," said the Georgia Democrat, "and the goals are elusive and vague."

So well said, Mr. President. So well said. Those goals have always been elusive and vague. I have stood on this floor saying they were elusive and vague for years: $20 billion ago they were elusive and vague. They have not defined what the purpose is. We were told the other day it was to defend against Brazilian or Indian—the country of India—ICBM's. I am not kidding, Mr. President. That is what the Wall Street Journal editorial, at least, said.

We have spent $20 billion for that? Maybe not, Mr. President. We are told now it is not for the astrodome. Nobody ever believed the astrodome, we are told. The President did not believe it. The Vice President did not believe it. The now Vice President, Vice President QUAYLE, did not believe it. It is all elusive and vague, according to the Armed Services Committee. And we are asked, again, to pile money on, a $600 million increase when we defeated a $300 million increase by a 2-to-1 margin the other night.

Mr. President, as I yield the floor I would like my friend from Nebraska, and I hope he speaks, to tell us why we should put $600 million into a program that remains, $20 billion later, with elusive and vague goals, where we do not know what we are doing, why we are doing it or what we would build if we build it, while at the same time taking money away from all the rest of the R&D programs of our armed services which are already short. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I have been listening to the debate and watching the developments between the House and the Senate on the defense appropriations bill and the defense authorization bill, that seem to be moving in tandem, or somewhere near in tandem, which is not, of course, the way it is supposed to be.

I have been listening to the debates, to people who voted in different ways on this matter in the past. I noticed the other day the Senate voted overwhelmingly to make a substantial cut in the SDI program. I have just been sitting here and I was reminded of a story that the late, great Ralph Brooks, the former Governor of Nebraska used to tell. I think it fits very aptly the procedures that we go through here.

The story was that a freight train and a passenger train ran together right at a railroad crossing. There was a terrible accident and, of course, lawsuits followed. The man who was standing there with a lantern in his hand, waving away traffic, was testifying on the stand and the plaintiff's attorney was questioning him.

He said, now, the picture was the freight train was coming 50 miles an hour this way and the passenger train was coming 60 miles an hour the other way and they met head on while you were standing out there waving that lantern. He said: Could you describe it just a little bit better for the jury?

The watchman said: Well, really, No, I can't. That is about what happened.

The plaintiff's attorney said: Well, what was going through your mind as you stood there waving that lantern and keeping the cars away and saw the freight train coming this way at 50 and the passenger train coming the other way at 60 miles an hour. What went through your mind?

And the watchman replied: Well, nothing.

And the plaintiff's attorney pressed him a little further and he recited and said: What went through your mind?

The watchman finally said: Well, I did think that was a heck of a way to run a railroad.

I cannot think of any better or more apt description of how we run this railroad than what we are going through right now. The matter at hand was in the strategic subcommittee, as far as the Armed Services Committee was concerned. The chairman of that subcommittee of jurisdiction was totally surprised by this latest move. I have been warning those involved to be careful of what they do.

My credentials, I think, are very clear with regard to SDI. Certainly my friend from Louisiana knows where I have stood on this on numerous occasions when we have debated the issue, and once or twice won or lost by one or two votes.

From the very beginning, as the Senator from Louisiana said very correctly, I have been up front with the statement that I feel we should fund the SDI program at about last year's level. Not the $1 billion increase or so that the President requested. Not even more than that that the former President wanted to spend on SDI. But I wanted to have it somewhere in that area. And all of the marks that we have been working for in the authorization process were to try to get to that approximate figure, given what we knew the House was likely to do.

What happened? As we were going into conference with the House of Representatives in the defense authorization bill, our Senate measure, after debate and votes here, was $4.3 billion. The House position was $2.8 billion—a big difference.

As I went into that conference and sat down at the table across from the House conferees—this gives my colleagues a little bit of insight into how these things happen—I was handed a note that said the Senate Appropriations Committee in its wisdom or lack thereof, had reduced the amount to $3.7 billion.

Anybody who has been in conference with the House in a leadership position knows full well that the legs were cut out from under this Senator by the actions of the Appropriations Committee. Now it seems that certain members of that Appropriations Committee who took that ill-advised action are now about ready to reverse themselves and say: We made a mistake.

Well, I suggest it is about time. It seems to me, Mr. President, we probably had best let well enough alone. Mr. President, the Senate expressed itself the other day on a whole series of issues, and some of the votes that cut SDI were because there were other funding mechanisms that some people had to be for. A heck of a way to run a railroad or a House and Senate or Senate conference committee.

I have mixed feelings what to do about this. I suspect even with my past credentials on SDI, the Senator from Louisiana assumed the Senator from Nebraska would not be casting his vote with the position of the Senator from Louisiana. Well, he may have thought that and frankly I had some ideas along those lines.

But I simply say that, as it stands now, I hope the amendment that has been offered will pass the U.S. Senate because, indeed, it will strengthen our position and allow us to get back to some funding level on SDI around where it was last year or a little bit lower than that. If we do not have that then I do not think there is any question but that we are going to have our legs cut out from under us even further by the actions of the Appropriations Committee.

I am very pleased to see that certain leaders of the Appropriations Committee that I understand voted to cut SDI to $3.7 billion are now beginning to have a change of mind. So I very likely will vote in support of the amendment but with the clear understanding that I am doing that only, not to increase SDI funding above what it was, but to try to keep it at some appropriate level, in that area which is about, just over or just below last year's funding level.

And why is that, Mr. President? Because I believe that SDI is not fully understood or appreciated by many. My particular belief is that it is important that we continue research and development on SDI, not from the standpoint of an immediate deployment of that vastly overrated system that was originally sold to us, the one that the President in the Chair will remember showed a little girl with a red crayon and a yellow coloring book, drawing a oval like this and then bombs coming down and dropping off to the side. That particular ad, and that particular philosophy, has done more to kill legitimate interests in what SDI I hope some day can do anything else.

So I have never tried to oversell or undersell the SDI Program. I have always supported some reasonable funding level.

I simply say, Mr. President, that SDI is important in research and development simply because whether or not we make an agreement with the Soviet Union on START and then proceed on down the line, it seems to me the United States of America has to have some form of SDI, a limited form of SDI at a minimum that protects this country and gives us at least 95 percent assurance that some Third World nation, a Qadhafi, if you will, could not get their hands on at least, maybe a rudimentary type of ICBM without accuracy, but use it to blackmail the United States or some of our allies.

We simply have to have something, aside from the real, imagined, or potential threat from the Soviet Union to protect this country from nonsuperpowers who may threaten us at some time in the future or try and threaten the President of the United States now or in the future, under conditions that far too many people have not yet envisioned.

I, therefore, say, Mr. President, I do hope that the Senate will agree to the amendment, even though it will be interpreted, as it should be: A reversal of the vote that was cast just 2 days ago.

I yield the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBB). The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to rise to speak of my amendment. I appreciate the Senator from Alaska introducing it on my behalf as I could not be here.

I want to point out that I do not think that the recent vote which occurred September 26 in which there was a vote of 66 nays and 34 yeas pertaining to a substitute to the committee amendment provided a true vote on SDI. That amendment, while it prevented increases in SDI, was a mixture of many things. There were matters pertaining to space and helicopters that placed some Senators in the position that they could not vote for it even though it provided additional funding for the SDI Program.

This amendment is an effort to try to have a straightforward, up-and-down SDI where there is none of the other matters that would divert.

Some wanted to know where the offset was. This amendment takes the additional funding out of the general research and development where the Secretary has the authority to make certain discretionary decisions so there is no specific offset that comes out of another program. Some people, if I have talked to them about this, have had some question as to where it is going to come out.

So I think you can be assured that really nothing is changed from the bill, as a whole, other than the discretionary amount for DOD R&D that the Secretary of Defense has. It is more than $37 billion provided to R&D in the bill. This amendment would cause only a very small percentage decrease in other R&D programs to provide the addition for SDI.

The true vote, I think, on SDI was cast when we had the authorization bill when the amendment to cut funding for SDI was defeated. With that the Senate authorized $4.3 billion—the same level as in my amendment. I think at that time when the SDI won is more indicative than this vote only a day or so ago in which SDI appeared to have lost 2 to 1. As we all know many other programs were considered in that vote also.

I have noticed that the chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee and the manager handling this, the distinguished Senator from Hawaii, has not spoken on this amendment.

If he would respond to my question with regard to it. Would the distinguished Senator from Hawaii, the floor manager of the DOD appropriations bill that we are handling now, make a statement on his opinion relative to this amendment?

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, if I may respond, the record will clearly show that over the years I have supported the lower numbers, and on many occasions I have supported my friend from Louisiana. Having said that, I am also well aware that the outcome of the conference now being held between the authorizers of the House and the Senate will have a significant impact upon the work of the appropriators in their conference.

Second, I have been called upon by the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee asking me to assist him in this matter because it will serve to expedite and conclude the conference so that we can have an authorization bill before we proceed with our conference.

Third, Mr. President, as I announced when the debate opened on this bill, I have made every effort to work as closely as possible with the chairman of the authorizing committee to avoid the disunity which has been demonstrated on this floor for too many years, and I believe that now is the time when I should come to the aid of my friend from Georgia.

Finally, having participated in conferences for the past 27 years, I know very well that the number $4.3 billion will not be the final number. I would anticipate that with that number, if we do well, it would be somewhere in the vicinity of $3.6 billion, which would be just about where our bill calls for at this time. Therefore, I will be casting my vote in favor of the Heflin amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I appreciate the remarks of the distinguished chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee. That is certainly a welcome vote. That the manager and chairman of the subcommittee who deals with military appropriations will vote for the Heflin amendment is very much appreciated. So I greatly appreciate his statement and his words there.

I know there are others who want to speak. I do want to make this statement. I was originally opposed to the Johnston amendment on fencing directed energy weapons because I think that it would have meant that other important SDI programs would suffer if the overall funding level went too low. If the Helfin amendment passed, adding $600 million to SDI, bringing it to the Senate-passed level in the DOD authorization bill, I do not believe that the fencing for directed energy will be harmful to the SDI Program overall.

But if my amendment is adopted, then I believe that the Johnston amendment will be acceptable to many Senators who would have otherwise opposed it.

In that regard, I hope the Johnston amendment will carry if my amendment carries in this instance.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support my amendment and support the SDI Program.

I yield the floor.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I say the Senator from Louisiana appears as though he wishes to respond. I have no desire to interfere with that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I thank the Senator from Wyoming. I think the vote is going to occur at 2:15.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time between now and 2:15 be split between the Senator from Wyoming and myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I would just say, I think it is not exactly an accurate characteristic of the events of the other evening that SDI was the linchpin of that 66-to-34 vote.

I think an examination of who voted in which direction clearly demonstrates that SDI was not the linchpin. For some it was NASA, for Senator GARN and Senator GRAMM, who are both long-time SDI supporters, and for example, Senator MACK as well. For others it was the Apache helicopter, Senator MCCAIN and Senator BOND.

I am not going to characterize the votes of anybody on the other side. But these were clearly votes based on what I described at the time as hometown economics. I understand that as well as anybody else.

The Senator from Louisiana asks a decent question: Why do we need a high SDI figure now when in the past we have not needed it?

For one good reason. Not in the recent history of these events, probably since the Budget Act, has the Senate Armed Services Committee and the Senate Appropriations Committee been so far apart going into conference on SDI and a good many other issues.

Our ability to narrow these things in previous years was clearly more powerfully stated than it is today, and also the timing of those events was much more closely coincidental than it is today.

I think it was true, as my friend from Alaska tells me, that they were told that we would have this conference by the time we got to the appropriations bill. It has not worked out that way. All I say is that if we had such a strong bargaining position today, we would not have the Senators from Georgia, Alaska, Virginia, and Nebraska saying this is important to the posture that we have in the authorizing committee's conference.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, what we are involved in is a political hangover from the Reagan days when an unattainable dream was sold to the American people with hype, attendant with all of the great television ads and cartoons which said we can free this country from the threat of nuclear weapons by building SDI, and we dedicated $20 billion to the program, deluding ourselves as well as the American people in the process.

Mr. President, two nights after having defeated an increase in SDI of $300 million, we are now asked to go $600 million in increase. Mr. President, the proponents of this amendment ask us to engage in an exercise in self-delusion twice as big as they tried the other night. Why? Simply because they say we must demonstrate again that SDI is a more important program than the Senate and House believe it is. Why do we have to have such fealty, so much loyalty to these unattainable goals? Mr. President, the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee himself said it better than anybody else can say it I think, that it is a big pot of money and the goals are elusive and vague.

We have already armed these negotiators in this conference with a number bigger than anybody thinks they ought to have, $4.3 billion. That is what they asked for as a bargaining chip in the conference committee. They have it, Mr. President. We gave it to them. I say to the authorizers, go use the bargaining leverage you already have. This is the world of appropriations. We should not be trying to create some phony bargaining chip which House Members can see through as they can the clear air of a cloudless day. I ask my colleagues to recognize that the House has sense enough to be able to see through a phony bargaining chip, that this program with elusive goals should not cannibalize all the other good programs in the Department of Defense. The head of the Strategic Defense Command, General Chain, just recently testified before our committee, talking about the needs of strategic deterrence and his prepared statement did not mention SDI one time, not one word.

Mr. President, I ask my colleagues to do what they did the other night and hold to this figure of $3.7 billion, which is a big increase over last year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time allotted to the Senator from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I yield such time as remains to the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN] for 1 minute.

Mr. NUNN. I thank my friend from Wyoming.

Mr. President, I will make mine very short. This is a very pragmatic question. The Senator from Louisiana himself said that $3.2 billion as an outcome would be too low. What we are talking about is whether we are going to end up after all is said and done, both conferences, appropriations, and authorization, with somewhere in the neighborhood of $3.6, $3.7 billion. If we go the way the Senator from Louisiana is talking about, which is to keep this bill like it is, we are going to end up at a level below what he believes is wise.

Mr. President, I think this is the ultimate in pragmatism. I read a story the other day about a fellow who was called by the credit card company. The company told him somebody was out with his stolen credit card and spending money, and they asked him if he knew about it. He said, "Yes, I have known about it for a few months." They said, "Why didn't you notify us? He said, "Because I figured very carefully and the fellow was spending less money than my wife had been spending."

Mr. President, this is the ultimate pragmatic decision and I hope the Senate will be pragmatic.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Wyoming be allowed to have a couple minutes to speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSTON addressed the Chair.

Mr. HEFLIN. I withdraw that.

SOVIET RESPONSES TO SDI

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, one aspect of the SDI question that the executive branch has consistently given short shrift to is the question of Soviet responses to SDI. This issue is extremely important because there is abundant evidence that there are a whole host of relatively simple countermeasures to SDI that are available to the Soviets.

Soviet incentives to counter SDI are very strong, because if it were not for their strategic weapons, the Soviets would not be a superpower. As the National Intelligence Council's Assistant National Intelligence Officer for Science and Technology, Dr. Arthur Manfredi, Jr., has said:

Certainly the strategic defense initiative, by threatening the Soviet Union's basis for superpower status, its land- and sea-based ballistic missiles, threatens core Soviet military doctrine. Therefore, their defense industry will be called upon to meet the challenge.

Dr. Manfredi analyzed the issue of Soviet responses to SDI in a very useful article that if anything understates the threat to SDI posed by Soviet countermeasures. I ask unanimous consent that his article from National Defense of February 1989, "Soviet Defense Industry Response To SDI," be placed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

NUCLEAR REALITY FAVORS OFFENSE OVER DEFENSE

Mr. BUMPERS. Strategic reality shows us that it is easier for the offense to overcome defense than for defense to defend successfully against offense. Look at the world of strategic bombers. We have all heard the argument that the Air Force makes about the B-2, how this $70 billion investment is going to offset $350 billion in Soviet spending on air defenses.

Did anyone stop to think this same logic may apply to SDI? That it is easier to offset missile defenses than it is to pay for them? Actually, it is probably even worse for SDI than the 5:1 cost ratio between offense and defense for air defense and bombers. It is much easier to shoot down a bomber than a missile. It takes a bomber 10 to 15 hours to reach its target, while it takes an ICBM one-half hour.

If people want to know what a world with no limits on missile defenses would look like, look at bombers. Ask the commander in chief of the Strategic Air Command whether 40 years of Soviet air defenses has kept his forces from being able to deliver a horrendous retaliation against the Soviets. The fact is, our bombers are more potent than ever, even though the Soviets have spent one-third of a trillion dollars in air defenses, five times more than we have spent on bombers.

SLBM's: We must not delude ourselves about countermeasures to SDI. There is an important lesson to be learned from our experience with submarine launched ballistic missiles [SLBM's] as well. Lockheed's missile and space division has designed and built every one of our SLBM's, from the Polaris A-1 up to the Trident II D-5. And now they are reluctantly going out of the new SLBM business because we do not need a new SLBM as long as the ABM Treaty stays in place. The Trident II does it all.

But Lockheed has missile designers just itching to develop countermeasures to SDI. And if both sides deploy SDI, we will need them. And the arms race would just accelerate. After all, if the Soviets did not have any air defenses, we would not need any bombers like the B-1 and B-2. We could just modify 747 airliners at a fraction of the price.

As one SDI scientist has said. "I'd rather have the Soviets' problem of figuring out how to defeat SDI than our job of trying to figure out how to make it work."

That statement should tell us something. With responses to SDI being so easy, if we go forward with SDI we will be getting on a treadmill that we will never get off, and the cost of staying on the treadmill will keep on going up and up.

OVER $1 TRILLION FOR A DEFENSE THAT WON'T DEFEND

SDI phase I will cost $69 billion, according to the Pentagon. If you add operating costs, inflation, and a few other things, it comes up to about $100 billion. And that is for an SDI that, even if it works as advertised, will be obsolete as soon as the Soviets deploy a few straightforward countermeasures.

What is more, phase 1 would just be a down payment. A report by Lawrence Livermore Laboratories said that a phase 2 of SDI lasers and beam weapons which we would need before the end of the first decade of the 21st century, would cost $541 billion. And that would become obsolete after a few more years, too. If phase 3 of SDI cost no more than phase 2, the first three phases of SDI would cost about $1.2 trillion.

In the meantime, we should not forget what Adm. William Crowe, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee this year:

Even if we could [deploy a perfect SDI], the United States would be vulnerable to an attack by cruise missiles launched by Soviet bombers or submarines.

That is great. If we go forward with SDI, we will spend $640 billion to $1.2 trillion for about 25 years' worth of very leaky and vulnerable SDI protection. And on top of that, it will not help us one whit against the fastest growing part of the Soviet threat: Bombers and cruise missiles. It is like putting 20 locks on your front door and leaving your back door wide open.

EASIEST WAY TO KILL SOVIET WARHEADS IS AT THE NEGOTIATING TABLE

Press reports say that one of the performance criteria the joint chiefs have laid down for SDI's phase 1 is that it be cable of destroying 50 percent of the Soviets' SS-18 warheads. As I see it, there are two ways to accomplish this. One is to spend $100 billion on SDI phase 1, followed by hundreds of billions more when phase 1 is quickly made obsolete by Soviet countermeasures.

The other way costs very little. Just sign a START treaty. We have already gotten the Soviets to agree to cut their SS-18 force by 50 percent in Geneva. With a little pushing, we may even get more and unlike SDI, it will not cost hundreds of billions in the future to maintain those cuts.

NOT ENOUGH MONEY FOR SDI IN THE BUDGET

But SDI has a bigger problem than Soviet countermeasures. It is the budget deficit. Even Bush's scaled back 5-year SDI plan calls for spending $9 billion in fiscal year 1994. Now does anyone think that we can afford that?

SDIO Director Monahan says that the 5-year plan's $33 billion is "the minimum needed to meet the goals established for the SDI by the President." If SDI gets $4.5 billion in each of the next 5 years, that would be $22.5 billion, or about one-third less than what General Monahan described as the minimum needed. And I think SDI would be lucky indeed to get that much funding.

BRILLIANT PEBBLES: A COST ESTIMATING FANTASY

We will hear a lot on the floor about Brilliant Pebbles. I am no expert on it, but let us keep a few things in mind.

First, we spent $46 million on Brilliant Pebbles in fiscal year 1989. That is slightly more than 1 percent of SDI's $4 billion in funding. Second, they are claiming that each Brilliant Pebble, crammed to the gills with a shrunken supercomputer, sensors that take the place of multihundred million dollar satellites, and ultrasophisticated communications gear, will cost about $500,000 each.

To put that cost in perspective, that is the Air Force's cost goal for the advanced medium range air-to-air missile [AMRAAM]. And the Air Force is having trouble keeping the AMRAAM within its cost goal. The AMRAAM missile is infinitely simpler than a Brilliant Pebble. It is an air-to-air missile with a vastly simpler computer, far simpler sensors, it gets carried by its fighter plane and doesn't need to be put in orbit, and it can be given frequent maintenance, unlike a space-deployed Brilliant Pebble.

And we are supposed to believe that a Brilliant Pebble will meet the same cost goal that a vastly simpler missile is having trouble meeting?

What does it say about a program that after you have already spent $17 billion on it, you suddenly turn it around completely when some flashy new idea is thought up. All the attention that Brilliant Pebbles is getting is not so much an endorsement of Brilliant Pebbles—it is an indictment of SDI.

Let us not get carried away by Brilliant Pebbles. Even the head of the SDI office, General Monahan, calls Brilliant Pebbles a concept, not a weapon. In these tighter fiscal times, there is enough money to do a good research program that hedges against a Soviet ABM Treaty breakout and exploits some of these new technologies. Or enough to do a bad development program, on an SDI system that is easily overcome by Soviet countermeasures, or that may well not work anyway.

HOW TO SPEND HUNDREDS OF BILLIONS IN 30 SECONDS

Keep in mind what we are talking about. Whether it is "Smart Rocks" or "Brilliant Pebbles," those things will have to start firing about 30 seconds after we get our first warning that the Soviets have started to attack. SDI officials have told me that we would have to start firing 60 seconds after the Soviets launch in order to let our "Smart Rocks" get to the Soviet missiles in time. And if the Soviets choose a cloudy day to unleash Armageddon, it takes those missiles 30 seconds to break cloud cover.

And unless we want to turn the fate of the world over to computers, we have to squeeze time for a senior official to say "OK, shoot." All in 30 seconds.

Just imagine if you had to make that decision. If you fire, and it turns out to be a false alarm, it would cost many billions, perhaps hundreds of billions, to refurbish the SDI system after that false alarm. And if you don't fire, but the attack was real, the whole system would be a waste. All to be decided in 30 seconds.

So the choice is ours. We can try to chase this SDI mirage, spending even greater sums of money, and cutting far more worthy defense programs in the process, to get a system that will do no more than we could accomplish by just signing a START agreement. Or we can fund a vigorous and robust research program at about $3 to $3.5 billion per year.

Let us make the obvious choice. We cannot afford the fantasy any longer. Let us cast a vote for sanity. Let us cap SDI funding and stop the self-delusion.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that two additional articles be placed in the RECORD. One is an excellent piece from the Journal of Legislation written by our esteemed colleague from Illinois, PAUL SIMON, entitled "The Future of SDI." This article, written last year, concisely highlights the most important shortcomings of SDI and makes clear that the appropriate way for us to go on with this program is a prudent research program only.

The other article is a piece written by my Defense aide, Bruce McDonald, that appears in this month's issue of "Arms Control Today." This piece, entitled "Lost in Space: SDI Struggles Through Its Sixth Year," is a fine review of the noteworthy SDI issues and developments that became prominent during 1988-89. I commend both of these excellent articles, as well as Dr. Manfredi's fine article, to my colleagues' attention.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXHIBIT 1

SOVIET DEFENSE—INDUSTRY IN RESPONSE TO SDI

(Dr. Arthur Manfredi, Jr.)

There is understandably much concern about how the Soviet Union will respond to the Strategic Defense Initiative. Much effort is being spent in postulating the likely response options the Soviets would choose. Because we do not know yet what components and architecture a strategic defense system would have, assessments of possible Soviets responses are usually done considering a range of possible U.S. strategic defense systems.[1] Even though predicting Soviet responses is thus somewhat of an academic behavior, one can inject some practical constraints. It is useful to array potential Soviet responses against the strengths and weaknesses of that country's defense industry, which will be tasked with actually producing whatever responsive weapon systems are chosen by the Soviet military leadership.

CATEGORIES OF RESPONSES

Potential Soviet military responses to SDI fall into five broad categories:

Proliferation. This is adding more ICBMs and SLBMs, the target of strategic defense, including mobile land-based systems. The goal would be to overwhelm the defense in order to ensure that a sufficient percentage of missiles would successfully make it through their various trajectory phases to release and deliver their reentry vehicles (which could also proliferate on each missile through higher payload fractionation levels) with their nuclear weapons.

Evasion. This involves using countermeasures to evade the defense. Potential techniques include fast-burn, specially-coated, rotating or decoy boosters to evade defense system elements that operate during boost phase; reentry vehicle decoys to confuse the strategic defense during the mid-course phase of the attack, and reentry vehicle decoys or maneuvering reentry vehicles that operate in the atmosphere near the target area during the terminal part of the attack.

Avoidance. In contrast to evasion, which continues reliance on ballistic missiles, adoption of avoidance would shift dependence to "air breathers:" aircraft and cruise missiles. SDI at present does not plan to defend against these types of weapon systems.

Suppression. This is the so-called "active" response, actually attacking the strategic defense to weaken or destroy it.

Emulation. Under this response, the Soviet Union would develop its own comprehensive strategic defense, emulating the United States. Under President Reagan's vision, this would be a desirable outcome, because it would shift the basis for the superpower relationship from mutual assured destruction to mutual assured survival.[2]

The above five categories will be discussed below. There are technical responses, responses which the Soviet defense industry could provide in some measure. There are other responses ("non-technical") that are not discussed herein, such as political, arms control, and propaganda. Any comprehensive assessment of Soviet responses to SDI should include these categories as well.

SOVIET DEFENSE INDUSTRY CHARACTERISTICS

The Soviet Union's weapons industry is the largest in the world.[3] It out-produces the United States by substantial margins in almost all classes of weapons system.[4]

The historical success of the Soviet defense industry can be traced to several factors, most notably its priority over the civilian sector is a command economy.

Centralized management has provided a strong link with the military customer.

Continuity of personnel has provided stability as well as an experience factor in the management structure.

The defense sector has both first claim on resources as well as institutional protection from diversion of resources to the civilian sector.

Authorization for weapons programs is done early and only once. If done in the same fashion in the United States, this would be the same as combining in a single decision Department of Defense approval, presidential approval, and congressional appropriation of multi-year funding.[5]

The military systems that the Soviet defense industry has produced share some common attributes.

The designs tend to be relatively simple, based on standardized components and proven technologies.

The systems are easily manufactured, using a relatively poor (by Western standards) base of both equipment and labor force.

The large numbers of systems produced are the result of very long production runs.

Already-developed Soviet systems frequently are improved by incremental upgrades rather than by replacement with new systems. This approach allows quick incorporation of new technologies, helps hold down costs, eases manufacture by often using existing production lines, and fits in nicely with the management continuity noted earlier.[6]

There are weaknesses associated with these attributes. The strong, centralized management, continuity, and early decisions make major change difficult, especially rapid change. This is true even when the national leadership wants change, and often requires personal intervention from above.[7] The fundamental flaw, of course, is the sti-fling of any entrepreneurial spirit, the hallmark of our free-market system, which is responsive to market forces.

The emphasis on proven technologies and incremental upgrades discourages risk-taking at all levels, from the designer to the producer.[8] Simple designs often have resulted in less sophisticated weapons than Western counterparts, in employment.[9] (This is an arguable point. Some would argue that the United States should shift more in the Soviet direction.)

There are several indicators that some changes are in the offing for the Soviet defense industry. These changes are being driven by a combination of factors, including economic pressures on the civilian side, the inexorable advance of technology, and U.S. initiatives,[10] not the least of which is SDI. Some of these trends are:

The priority of the defense industry will come under increasing scrutiny. While defense will continue to have high priority on a relative basis, that priority will be brought more in balance with civilian needs.

There is a slight but perceptible shift from almost total dependence on proven technologies to more advanced technologies, especially in the field of computer-aided design and manufacture.

There is a more pronounced shift from simple to more complex weapon designs. With this comes smaller numbers of systems and lower production rates. As the Soviets make this shift, they will buy multimission capabilities at the cost of higher procurement costs and maintenance needs.

The Soviets are trying to promote renovation and upgrade of existing defense industry facilities in contrast with their past practice of building new plants.

The Soviet have begun to make some changes in defense industry management practices, such as introducing incentives to encourage innovation and emphasizing quality over quantity. These changes are "around the edges." The centralized planning system remains.

The Soviets are adding to their aggressive program to acquire Western technology by attempting to upgrade the S&T capabilities of their East European allies. It is hard to believe that the Soviets would depend to any great extent on the East European countries to help them respond to SDI. Those countries are notoriously weak in high technology. The Soviets undoubtedly will continue to attempt to acquire Western technology by both legal and illegal means; history argues that they will continue to be successful in the acquisition but have difficulty in the assimilation of such technology into their production lines.[11]

THE MATCH-UP

How do the needs of the potential responses to SDI match up against the strengths and weaknesses of the Soviet defense industry? In some cases, pretty well; in others, not very.

Proliferation appears to be the Soviet Union's strong suit. The Soviet Union's land-based ballistic missile force is their premier service,[12] and will not roll over easily in the face of the challenge posed by SDI. The Soviet navy operates the world's largest strategic ballistic missile submarine force.[13] Both forces have been continually improved in the past,[14] and new generations of missiles are forecast for the 1990s. Many of the land-based missiles are projected to be mobile.[15] The Soviets' historical dependence on ballistic missiles to validate their superpower status coupled with the large and vested design and production establishment argue that this option will play a strong role in any U.S. deployment of a strategic defense system.

Evasion holds some promise for the Soviets, but in some areas they are weak. Major modifications to ballistic missile boosters would present problems for them. Wholly new boosters designed for fast-burn, having special coatings, or rotating would depart from their incremental upgrade approach to varying degress. On the other hand, adding decoys for boosters, decoys for reentry vehicles, or maneuvering reentry vehicles are options more in line, to varying degrees, with historical Soviet approaches.

Avoidance also holds some promises for the Soviets. They are working on new air- and sea-launched cruise missiles,[16] and a new long-range cruise missile is projected for the next century.[17] Here, too, the Soviet penchant for large numbers of systems would be an advantage. However, if the United States were to proceed with an Air Defense Initiative to complement a strategic defense system, Soviet incentives here might diminish.

Suppression, attacking the defense, is consistent with the Soviet "brute force" approach common in many areas. They have the world's only operational antisatellite system,[18] but it would be no match for components of a well-designed U.S. strategic defense system. Much effort is being devoted by the SDIO to anticipating potential Soviet attacks, and technically sophisticated counters to defense suppression will no doubt be incorporated into any U.S.-deployed system.[19] Thus, Soviet systems designed to attack a U.S. strategic defense system would necessarily also need to be sophisticated, and this area would be one of probable Soviet weakness.

Emulation would be fully consistent with Soviet military doctrine. Indeed, the Soviets already accord strategic defense a role equal to that of offensive forces.[20] The Soviet Union has worked on wide-ranging strategic defense programs since World War II.[21] They have the world's only operational antiballistic missile system[22] (around Moscow and fully compliant with the ABM Treaty). More important, they have a robust and expanding R&D program in the strategic defense area.[23] However, they are behind the United States in many key technologies,[24] so a head-to-head competition would put them at a disadvantage. The Soviets would probably not engage in a head-to-head competition. They would rather give the appearance of being equal while pursuing strategic defense systems which are less "high tech" than a U.S. system is likely to be.

OUTLOOK

Certainly the Strategic Defense Initiative, by threatening the Soviet Union's basis for superpower status, its land- and sea-based ballistic missiles, threatens core Soviet military doctrine.[25] Therefore, their defense industry will be called upon to meet the challenge. Challenged they will be, because this challenge will come on the heels of many others.

Many systemic problems of the Soviet defense industry will persist. The absence of strong support service industries, the lack of flexibility in the planned economy, the inefficiency of the entrenched bureaucracy, and the stifling excess of pervasive secrecy, all will hamper any Soviet efforts to expand broadly into high-technology weapon systems.[26]

On the other hand, several factors are in the Soviets' favor. The SDI program has been scaled back, primarily because of congressional funding cuts. This has slowed the pace of the research and thus extended program timeliness. This buys the Soviet defense industry precious time to research responses and be better prepared when U.S. intentions firm up. The Soviet Union as well has the advantage of the exceptional openness with which the SDI program is being conducted. Also, although generally lagging behind the West in key military technologies, the Soviet Union excels in some narrow areas such as some types of lasers and particle beam weapons, applicable to developing their own strategic defense systems as well as attacking elements of a U.S. strategic defense system.[27] Finally, the sheer size of the Soviet defense industry will allow their military establishment to continue to compensate with large numbers of weapons for shortfalls in capabilities.[28]

On balance, the Soviet defense industry will remain potent. It will continue to receive a large share of the best resources, and its leaders will continue to be influential.[29] The confluence of growing economic constraints[30] and continued advance of technology will present an uprecedented challenge to the Soviet defense industry. The Soviet Union may be especially vulnerable to vigorous U.S. R&D advances, and thus, perhaps, more anxious to make an arms control deal.

THE FUTURE OF SDI

(By Paul Simon)

INTRODUCTION

I welcome the opportunity to discuss the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI), which I oppose.

As in so many other things, the public has grasped the obvious, and that is why the negative phrase "Star Wars" has stuck (much to President Ronald Reagan's chagrin): neither the Soviet Union nor the United States can afford to let the other side get the upper hand militarily. If our lasers go up into space, theirs will soon follow. It will truly be Star Wars on a terrible scale.

In 1983, President Reagan invited the American people to glimpse the future. The President's vision of a total defense was enthralling and hopeful. He bid us to walk with him straight into a brave new world of futuristic space shields, a world where Soviet nuclear-tipped missiles were made "impotent and obsolete."

He asked for a down payment of twenty-six billion dollars over a five year period. After that money had been spent, his successors and the Congresses of the 1990's would sift through the facts and make an informed decision.

In theory, there is nothing objectionable to spending scarce resources on new ways to improve our nation's security. We routinely do this. The Constitution says that Congress shall provide for the common defense, and that has come to include a hefty annual sum for defense research and development.

But not every idea that comes down the pike makes sense politically or militarily, even if there is a glimmer of technical optimism. And SDI just does not make sense as presently constituted.

I support a research program on antimissile technologies. Almost everyone in Congress does. But a limited, prudent, research-only program consistent with the terms of the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty of 1972 is one thing; SDI is a crash program to build and deploy a questionable system of dubious merit. As Attorney General Edwin Meese has said, the Reagan Administration wants to "lock in" future Presidents and congressmen to its own particular SDI program.

The U.S.-Soviet nuclear standoff is cause for great concern, but SDI is the wrong way to go. The program is more likely to fuel the arms race than control it. For the foreseeable future, political solutions involving negotiations will build a safer world—not orbiting space shields armed with lasers and particle beams.

Each side has acquired approximately 25,000 nuclear warheads. We are locked in a stalemate. That stalemate is sometimes called "mutual assured destruction," or MAD. Both sides are deterred from striking the other because devastating retaliation would follow. This is the basic condition of life in the nuclear age.

For over forty years the world has lived with the terrible destructive power of nuclear weaponry. Our best scientists and engineers, our military commanders and civilian strategists, tell us that nuclear weapons are of a completely different nature than conventional weapons.

Unfortunately, too many people continue to think of nuclear weapons as if they were only slightly different from the bombs we dropped during World War II—more powerful, perhaps, but really not that different. Too many national security officials believe that nuclear warfare is practical. A few even believe that victory is possible.

But Hiroshima was destroyed by a single nuclear bomb with a yield of just thirteen kilotons (the blast of which is equal to 13,000 tons of TNT). An entire city wiped off the face of the earth by a single blast. Today's weapons are many times as destructive, and there are 50,000 such weapons around the globe. Nuclear weapons, especially today's multi-megaton devices, are so potent that a mere handful can effectively destroy the northern hemisphere in a matter of hours.

EXPLODING SOME SDI MYTHS

The invincibility myth

Let me take on some of the myths about SDI.

The first is that we can, in the words of former Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger, erect a "thoroughly reliable defense."

It does not matter how good our technology becomes. There has never been a defense that has proven foolproof or leakproof, and there is no prospect that such a defense can be erected. SDI does not contemplate stopping all methods of delivering nuclear weapons—cruise missiles, for example.

Any defense can be directly or indirectly attacked, or it can be overcome. A wall can be breached, torn down or circumvented. Once that happens, all the computer simulations and wargaming will go right out the window, because the system will break down.

We are told that Star Wars might stop ninety or ninety-five percent of incoming warheads. But the nerve-center holding any strategic defense together—the advanced computers—can never be realistically tested. The only true test can be nuclear war itself, because testing individual parts of the defense will not tell how it will function as a whole under immense stress and direct attack. The French Maginot Line, a wonderful piece of advanced technology for its day, was out-flanked. And, just like the Maginot Line, SDI is not being "perfectly" designed. SDI will not protect us against cruise missiles, manned bombers, ballistic missiles that never leave the earth's atmosphere, and "suitcase" bombs. These weapons of mass destruction will continue to threaten civilization regardless of SDI.

The most likely result of SDI is a greater number of Soviet offensive nuclear weapons. Soviet leaders want to be sure that they can overwhelm or evade any U.S. defense. Given the substantial current lag in Soviet ballistic missile defense technology, it seems clear that the Soviet military would achieve this goal by building up and diversifying their current strategic arsenal. We would probably do the same if the Soviet Union deployed their own Star Wars system.

Another myth is that a space defense can be built "on the cheap." One leading conservative group, the Marshall Institute, estimates total costs at $120 billion; still others give lower estimates. The reality is that our best independent estimates put the cost at well over one trillion dollars, and perhaps over two trillion, because any SDI system will have to be constantly maintained and upgraded.

Now, two trillion dollars is a mind-boggling sum. The most expensive construction project to date in the history of humanity has been the U.S. interstate highway system, where initial construction costs totaled $123 billion over a number of years. Two trillion dollars is approximately sixteen times the cost of the interstate highway system. The reality is that initial SDI costs will be at least eight times as high as the interstate highway system. The Congressional Research Service has estimated that a Star Wars deployment beginning in the years 1997-2000 could cost as much as 1 trillion for launch costs alone.

In fiscal year 1988 the SDI program will spend $3.9 billion. The Reagan Administration wants more than one billion dollars additionally, for a total of five billion dollars, for fiscal year 1989. Most experts believe a well-run basic research effort can be had for far less money. In short, we are spending too much on SDI research. I am deeply troubled about our nation's sense of priorities. The current budget level for SDI research is approximately three times as much as the federal government spends on cancer research.

And how would a space defense be financed? There are only three ways to do it. Number one, you substantially increase taxes. Number two, you cut other defense and our social programs substantially. Or number three, run up astronomical deficits, far greater than any we have seen to date, and send the bills to our children and grandchildren.

These are not responsible choices. Would it not be far cheaper to negotiate arms reductions? Every missile and warhead we remove through verifiable arms control is a missile and warhead that cannot be used against us. The cost of sending a negotiating team to Geneva is incomparably less than the cost of building, deploying, and maintaining a defense in space.

The arms control myth

The third myth is that SDI will help bring about arms reductions. SDI proponents argue that it is, or will become, a bargaining chip in arms talks. But unless you cash in your bargaining chip, it provides you no negotiating leverage. President Reagan and his followers are serious about deploying a space defense. They have gone well beyond research. This unduly complicates our negotiations with the Soviet Union.

I have proposed a much cheaper alternative to SDI, and a much safer one: a ballistic missile flight test ban. It is fully verifiable. A flight test ban will remove Soviet confidence in planning a first strike.

Think of a marksman. If he or she is somehow prevented from going down to the range for target practice, odds are very great that that person will do poorly at the meet. He or she will hit something, but it will not be the bullseye.

A flight test ban will have the same effect. The United States and the Soviet Union will still deter one another—we know, after forty years of flight testing, that we can hit the other country and destroy major cities and installations—but neither they nor we will have the pinpoint accuracy to take out the other side's nuclear missiles. We will both take a step back from the hair-trigger, the "use them or lose them" problem, and the arms race will slow down as a result.

CONCLUSION

Time and again, the United States has turned to technological advances to provide its citizens a measure of security. Each time the Soviet Union has caught up, and each time we go back to the labs for a bigger and better solution. Paul Warnke, President Carter's SALT II negotiator, captured the essence of the arms race when he wrote that we have become "apes on a treadmill."

SDI will not get us off that treadmill. No technological solution, by itself, could possibly do so. If we want to build a safer future, if we truly wish to see nuclear weapons greatly reduced and gradually eliminated, we have no other choice but to negotiate them away. And at the same time we will create more understanding, and reduce fear—the ultimate cause of the arms race.

LOST IN SPACE: SDI STRUGGLES THROUGH ITS SIXTH YEAR

(By Bruce W. MacDonald)

In the last twelve months, the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI) has encountered the roughest sailing of its six-year existence. Taking on more technological and political water than it could discharge, SDI has changed course several times in the last year in an increasingly desperate attempt to reach program milestones in the face of slackening fiscal and political winds.

From the program's basic justification to technical goals to budget prospects, every aspect of SDI has been buffeted by the winds of change. The Bush administration has shorn the program of its greatest political appeal by acknowledging that SDI cannot provide the near-absolute protection against the Soviet thermonuclear threat that President Reagan has envisioned. In giving SDI instead the mission of enhancing deterrence, the Bush administration has chosen a crowded playing field offering numerous alternatives to near-term missile defenses.

Technically, the Strategic Defense Initiative Organization (SDIO) has drastically revised its plans for "Phase I" missile defenses, with a new focus on the previously obscure "Brilliant Pebbles" space rocket concept.

At the same time, the Bush administration in one stroke cut President Reagan's five-year projected SDI budget by more than the entire amount Congress had cut from the program over the past six years of contentious debate. Congress is cutting President Bush's proposal still further: for the first time, the Fiscal Year 1990 funding level for SDI may be less than the previous year's. In the face of these multiple blows, it is clear that SDI's future prospects are dimmer than ever.

NO MORE ASTRODOME

In the past, SDI for the most was considered separately from other items in the strategic weapons part of the defense budget. None of them could pretend to offer what SDI pretended to offer: the prospect of "thoroughly reliable defenses" against nuclear missiles. But now, the unrealistic pretense that such perfect or near-perfect defenses will be feasible in the foreseeable future has been effectively abandoned.

That process began while President Reagan was still in office. In a revealing interview in the Seattle Post Intelligence late last year, then-Secretary of Defense Frank Carlucci admitted that SDI would not be the "impenetrable shield" envisioned by President Reagan, portraying the program instead as strengthening deterrence by increasing uncertainty in Soviet war planning.

Similarly, John Tower, President Bush's ill-fated first choice for secretary of defense, acknowledged early on in his confirmation process that the Bush administration did not consider it possible to "devise an umbrella that can protect the entire American population from nuclear incineration." This view, which was nothing new to those who had been following the program over the years, nontheless created headlines across the country because it came from a previously strong SDI supporter who clearly was speaking on behalf of the administration.

The point was reiterated by Admiral William Crowe, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who told the Senate's Defense Appropriations Subcommittee that "we will never be able to deploy an SDI that is 100 percent effective under all circumstances and even if we could, the U.S. would be vulnerable to an attack by cruise missiles launched by Soviet bombers or submarines." Defense Secretary Dick Cheney called a missile umbrella based on SDI "an extremely remote proposition," acknowledging that SDI has been "oversold." The Bush administration was now saying openly what SDI critics were taken to task for saying just a year earlier.

STRENGTHENING DETERRENCE

By abandoning the fiction that SDI could provide an "astrodome" defense against nuclear attack, the Bush administration was only recognizing the realities of offensive weapons capabilities. And by retreating to more intellectually defensible position for SDI—that a limited Phase I system would strengthen deterrence by complicating Soviet planning for an attack—the Bush administration would avoid looking naive when defending the program, and bring expectations into line with the actual design requirements for the first-phase missile defense that is now the focus of the SDI program.

Those requirements set by the Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS), call for only a very partial defense—what JCS Vice Chairman General Robert Herres has called "the minimum capability required to begin making a contribution to deterrence . . . the least militarily significant capability." While the specifics of these JCS requirements for the Phase I missile defense remain classified, there have been several published reports on them, most recently in late June, when the magazine Aviation Week and Space Technology reported that they call for the system to "be effective against 50 percent of the Soviet SS-18 warhead force and 30 percent of a first wave attack of 4,700 warheads."

It is important to note that the liquid-propellant SS-18 ICBM, on which these JCS requirements focus, has a booster burn time about 60 percent longer than solid-propellant missiles such as the U.S. Minuteman III and MX, or the Soviet SS-24 and SS-25. If the Soviets were to replace their SS-18s with harder-to-intercept solid-propellant missiles, it is likely that the performance of Phase I of SDI would be seriously degraded. In other words, Phase I can be defeated by missile technology which the United States has had for over 20 years and which the Soviets are now deploying.

Moreover, as pointed out in last year's Senate staff report on SDI, such a Phase I defense would do significantly less to reduce the number of Soviet warheads that could hit the United States in a nuclear war than would a START agreement—particularly when one considers the likely Soviet offensive buildup in response to missile defense deployments.

The Bush administration's decision to settle on more modest objectives for SDI, focused on enhancing deterrence, is again made explicit in President Bush's recent classified National Security Directive 14 on "ICBM Modernization and Strategic Defense Initiative," signed on June 14. In an unclassified paragraph, the directive calls for the development of "options for strengthening deterrence and stability through the deployment of strategic defenses based on advanced technologies."

But this shift to a deterrence rationale has opened up a whole new avenue for congressional scrutiny. Here, SDI finds itself in the midst of a budgetary jungle competing for scarce program resources against a host of other programs with the same objective. The Midgetman ICBM and the B-2 "Stealth" bomber are only the most obvious of many deterrence-strengthening programs. Senator Sam Nunn (D-GA), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, raised this very issue in remarks he made in mid-June to the Institute for Foreign Policy Analysis, where he pointed out that MX rail-garrison and Midgetman as well as SDI sought to increase the uncertainty facing Soviet war planners, and could probably do so for far less than SDI would cost.

Five members of the Senate Defense Appropriations Subcommittee made this same point in a letter sent to Senator Nunn in late June:

"The administration's explicit, and long overdue rejection of SDI's original goal of an "astrodome" defense that substitutes for deterrence should alter the way the program is viewed. SDI is now only another means of achieving deterrence . . . MX-rail garrison and Midgetman seek to accomplish that same objective through mobility . . . We do not believe the Congress should provide any additional increase in funding for SDI until it can identify what gap in future strategic deterrence SDI would fill, or what ICBM modernization program it seeks to displace."

Unless the Bush administration can provide convincing answers to such questions, the likelihood that Congress will provide funding for deployment of a Phase I missile defense will be virtually nil.

AN ALPS ALTERNATIVE?

The administration still has the option of pursuing even more restricted goals, such as a thin defense against accidentally launched or Third World missiles. However, this concept has recently received much less attention than many predicted when Senator Nunn raised the idea of an Accidental Launch Protection System (ALPS) in January of 1988. As Nunn has acknowledged, an ALPS system within the bounds of the ABM Treaty would be inadequate even against such limited attacks. But modifying the treaty to permit a more widespread system could seriously undermine its contribution to U.S. security.

In the unlikely event of an accidental or unauthorized launch, the launch could just as well involve 10 or several tons of missiles, each having as many as 10 warheads, since in the United States, and presumably in the Soviet Union, the smallest unit of command and control over offensive missiles deals with 10 ICBMs, or 16 SLBMs. A thin ALPS system would probably not make much of a dent in such a large accidental attack. And any significant degree of offensive countermeasures such as decoys, chaff, etc., carried by such missiles would reduce ALPS's effectiveness still more. In addition, limitations on radar and interceptor coverage would prevent an ALPS system from effectively covering the U.S. coasts against submarine-launched or some Third World missiles.

At the same time, the proposal by some SDI contractors to modify the ABM Treaty to allow a larger number of sites and interceptors could increase the danger of a rapid Soviet breakout from the accord. Under a modified treaty, the Soviet Union would have to be permitted at least as many ABM sites as the United States—possibly more, since providing ALPS protection for the Soviet Union's larger territory would be more difficult. With a nationwide ABM infrastructure already in place, the Soviet Union would then be well-equipped to expand its defenses, a situation which could have a substantial negative impact on U.S. security. Senator Nunn himself has rejected modifying the treaty so substantially for ALPS.

Despite these hurdles, the White House Panel on the Strategic Defense Initiative in September of 1988 recommended a form of ALPS "as a near-term objective." But calmer heads in the Bush administration prevailed, probably strengthened by the decidedly cool response to ALPS from the Joint Chiefs. JCS Chairman Crowe testified last year that the probability of an accidental missile launch is "very, very low," and told a Senate panel in March that "we must bear in mind, however, that a system of this type would have to deal effectively with random and unforeseen events and achieve nearly 100 percent effectiveness to be worthwhile as an investment."

The growing recognition in military and technical circles of ALPS's shortcomings, coupled with an apparent lack of administration enthusiasm for the idea, has resulted in relatively little congressional interest in 1989. A thin SDI in the form of ALPS thus seems unlikely to emerge as a consensus goal for the SDI program in the next year.

AN SDI BARGAINING CHIP?

Another possible mission for SDI is as a bargaining chip or lever in the Geneva negotiations on reducing nuclear arms. In times past, SDI supporters were able to make effective use of the argument that Congress should not undercut the negotiations by cutting SDI funding. But with President Bush himself making substantial cuts in proposed SDI spending, and word leaking out that the Joint Chiefs have favored even deeper cuts, this argument has faded greatly. Indeed, many in Congress have recognized that the prospect of SDI deployment is now more a barrier to agreement than a useful bargaining lever, and that Congress has played an essential role by insisting that the SDI program remain within the traditional bounds of the ABM Treaty.

In the arms talks themselves, little has changed with respect to SDI. The Bush administration's public position has shown none of the change that has swept through other aspects of the SDI program. President Bush announced on May 12 that he will preserve the U.S. option to deploy SDI in the Defense and Space Talks in Geneva. Press reports indicate that there has been no substantial change from the Reagan administration's negotiating position calling for Soviet acceptance of the discredited "broad" interpretation of the ABM Treaty, and of a U.S. "right" to deploy SDI after an agreed period of years. These positions were left unchanged despite the warnings by the Joint Chiefs that such a right-to-deploy clause could leave the Soviets in a better position to deploy missile defenses than the United States. Reports of the JCS recommendation against the President's SDI negotiating position further weakened the "don't undercut the President" argument for approving SDI funding.

Predictably, given this unyielding position on SDI, the stalemate in Geneva over the future of the ABM Treaty continues. When the talks recessed on August 7, the U.S. and Soviet negotiators agreed that little progress has been made on the issue. Soviet negotiator Yuri Nazarkin repeated the Soviet position that maintaining the ABM Treaty was critical to Soviet acceptance of offensive reductions, a point also emphasized by Marshal Sergei Akhromeyev, former chief of the Soviet General Staff, in his recent visit to the United States.

A SHIFTING TECHNICAL COURSE

In the last years of the Reagan administration, SDI put an ever-increasing emphasis on development of a near-term Phase I missile defense, using space-based and ground-based rocket interceptors, at the expense of longer-term technologies. This first phase of SDI, which has become the central focus of the program, has undergone major revisions over the past year.

As recently as mid-1988, plans for Phase I presented to Congress called for: as many as 300 space-based interceptor (SBI) garages, each containing about 10 interceptors; a large number of ground-based hit-to-kill rockets called ERIS (Exoatmospheric Reentry vehicle Interceptor Subsystem); and assoicated sensor satellites. The total cost of that architecture, or collection of components, was estimated at $115 billion by JCS Vice Chairman General Herres.

Doubts about this version of Phase I were growing, however, even within the Reagan administration. Though composed largely of SDI advocates, the White House Panel on the Strategic Defense Initiative criticized SDIO's approach to Phase I deployment in September 1988, calling it "technically risky," and warning that it "would call for more budgetary and other resources than appear to be available."

These concerns culminated in the Defense Department presenting a major revision of this Phase I proposal in October 1988. The number of orbiting SBI garages was halved to roughly 150, while the number of ground-based ERIS rockets was increased by about 70 percent. Much of the battle management, communication, fire control, and other functions were removed from the SBI garages and put elsewhere in the system, primarily on the Space-based Surveillance and Tracking System (SSTS) satellites, which were reduced in number and sensor capability. Coupled with alleged increases in space interceptor performance, this led to a 65 percent reduction in the estimated cost of the SBI component, from $52 billion down to $18 billion. Other system cost savings resulted in a revised total Phase I cost estimate of $69 billion, a $46 billion reduction from that presented just months earlier. This covers only the direct costs of Phase I—basic research costs during the same period for follow-on phases of SDI as well as additional development costs for Phase I will cost at least $28.8 billion, and possibly more. Operational costs would also add to the total.

While reducing costs, this revised architecture also appeared to increase the vulnerability of Phase I by concentrating the key battle management and fire control functions in far fewer satellites. Indeed, after taking office in early 1989, the new director of SDIO, Lieutenant General George Monahan, referred to the redesigned SSTS satellities as "fat, juicy targets," saying, "We have a dependency here that I'm not real wild about." In addition, cutting the number of SBI carrier vehicles would allow more launched ICBMs and SLBMs to survive at least into the mid-course of their trajectories, giving the missiles time to dispense decoys and other countermeasures. This would complicate the already major challenge facing mid-course sensors in discriminating decoys from real reentry vehicles. Yet the need to reduce the cost of the system in the face of growing budget austerity seems to have made SDIO willing to accept these substantial risks.

This new architecture faced considerable skepticism in Congress. Senator Nunn pointed out that costs often fall when the Defense Department is selling a new system, only to rise again when it comes time to pay the bill. Nunn also wondered, "Given what has seemed to be a constantly shifting architecture, how confident can we be that this latest plan won't also undergo significant revisions in the coming months?" The seeds of such a change were sown in the testimony given that day, where small mention was made of a radically different approach to near-term defenses enigmatically named "Brilliant Pebbles."

BRILLIANT PEBBLES TAKES CENTER STAGE

Spawned in the fertile minds of Lawrence Livermore scientists about two years ago, the Brilliant Pebbles concept would take virtually all of the Phase I components involved with intercepting ballistic missiles in their boost phase and concentrate them into one type of small, high-tech space rocket, the "pebble." Anywhere from several thousand to 100,000 pebbles would be placed in several different low earth orbits. Given a command to activate by an early warning sensor, each one would scan its vicinity for missiles. Those pebbles that were within range of the missiles would activate and home on the missiles' hot plumes, intercepting them by direct collision.

Advocates claim that microminiaturization would allow each pebble to be substantially smaller than the previously-planned space-based interceptors, even though the pebble and its "cocoon" housing would be crammed with high-technology sensors, a small computer with the computing power of a Cray I supercomputer, and other equipment. Supporters argue that each pebble would weigh only 88 pounds. SDIO Director Monahan has said that Brilliant Pebbles, if feasible, could begin flight testing within two years.

Perhaps the most extraordinary claim being made for "Pebbles" is its projected cost—the target is for each pebble to cost $1 million, which includes operating costs, or about $500,000 in production costs. This is far less than even the most optimistic estimates for space-based interceptors, though engineers at Rockwell and Martin Marietta have been working diligently for years to reduce the cost for that system.

To put this hoped-for price in perspective, it is useful to recall that the Air Force is today having difficulty in producing its Advanced Air-to-Air Missile (AMRAAM) at a cost of $480,000, about the same cost as a Brilliant Pebble. In fact, developmental problems in the program were threatening to cause AMRAAM to exceed its cost goal by several hundred thousand dollars, and so some performance degradation was accepted to keep the lid on the price.

Brillant Pebbles would be procured in roughly the same numbers as AMRAAM—24,000 AMRAAMs are planned for production—and yet AMRAAM's million is trivially simple in comparison to Brilliant Pebbles. AMRAAM does not have to "acquire" its target, a task performed by the aircraft that carries it, unlike a pebble, and AMRAAM receives guidance instructions from its mother aircraft for the first part of its flight path. AMRAAM's computer is not remotely comparable to a Cray computer in its complexity. AMRAAM does not require the extremely high level of accuracy that a pebble does because AMRAAM has a high-explosive warhead while Brilliant Pebbles relies upon direct impact with its target to destroy it.

And AMRAAM missiles can be maintained, checked, and overhauled routinely, while Brillant Pebbles must survive unattended in space for years. If Pebbles is compared to other military satellites which must meet such long-term space operation requirements, the price contrast is even more stark: the price tag for the NAVSTAR system, the cheapest satellite in the current Air Force inventory, is roughly $50 million per satellite, 50 to 100 times the currently-projected price per pebble. For this and many other reasons, it seems unlikely that the cost of each Brillant Pebbles will be anything like $500,000.

Moreover, as with the SBI, the range of each Brillant Pebbles would be limited by how far it could fly during the boost and post-boost phase of Soviet missiles' flight, when the pebbles are designed to do their work. Soviet fast-burn boosters could dramatically undermine the effectiveness of such space rockets, particularly if clustered in areas of a few hundred miles, so that only a small fraction of the orbiting pebbles would be within range at any given time. As a result, even if the Brillant Pebbles idea were to meet all the cost, miniaturization, and effectiveness targets its advocates have set for it, it would not provide protection against the long-term Soviet threat.

Nevertheless, Brilliant Pebbles has become the rhetorical and technological centerpiece of the SDI program—though the Phase I architecture presented in October 1988 is officially still in place. This shift to Brilliant Pebbles was foreshadowed in a remarkable "swan song" memorandum from Lieutenant General James Abrahamson, the outgoing director of SDIO. Abrahamson shined the strongest possible spotlight on Brilliant Pebbles. What had previously been almost a curiosity in the SDI program was now given top billing: although only months before Abrahamson had personally outlined and advocated the revised Phase I system before Congress, he now claimed that Brilliant Pebbles could do the same job much sooner at far less cost, implicitly a devastating critique of the previous system. Abrahamson argued that such a system "can be proven in two years, with deployment starting three years later," and that a full-up Brilliant Pebbles system, complete with warning satellites, command and control, and full research, would cost just $25 billion—less than the cost of the B-1 bomber.

Although Abrahamson has been replaced as captain of the SDI ship by Lieutenant General George Monahan, an experienced program manager of a more pragmatic, less evangelical stripe, the rhetorical emphasis on Brilliant Pebbles remains. Monahan told the Senate this spring that "SDI will continue toward deployment of a system that will meet the requirements of Phase I by focusing on evaluating the potential of the most rapidly advancing technologies such as Brilliant Pebbles." These words echoed those of Defense Secretary Cheney several weeks before, which were themselves similar to Vice President Quayle's strong endorsement of Brilliant Pebbles in March.

In answers to questions, however, Monahan was more circumspect about Brilliant Pebbles, a refreshing change from Abrahamson's fervid advocacy. He repeatedly referred to Brilliant Pebbles as a "concept," and told reporters: "I wonder about its feasibility." He described the idea as being in the "very, very early stages of research and development," and announced that the revolutionary claims made by advocates needed "a sanity check," which would be provided by outside, independent reviews of the program.

Funding for Brilliant Pebbles was a modest $46 million in Fiscal Year 1989, but that will probably be increased sharply in Fiscal Year 1990. Pending the results of Monahan's reviews, Brilliant Pebbles could be funded at as much as $150 million in FY 1990, according to one source. Indeed, so great is the interest in Brilliant Pebbles that SDIO will decide by Thanksgiving whether to drop the space-based weapons that are currently the heart of the Phase I architecture entirely, replacing them with Brilliant Pebbles.

For a weapon that is still in the concept stage, the attention given to Brilliant Pebbles is unprecedented, given that about $17 billion has already been spent on program elements that Brilliant Pebbles would largely replace. The attention currently devoted to this new weapons concept is not so much an endorsement of Brilliant Pebbles as it is an indictment of the work that has gone on before it.

PROGRESS IN TESTS?

In the technical realm, SDIO claimed great progress in technology over the last year. There have been three major SDI tests to date in 1989. The Delta Star test launched on March 24 is taking measurements of rocket plumes and space background environments, to collect basic data needed to design SDI sensors. The cover for one of the experiment sensors did not open quickly enough to gather data from the deorbit burn of the second stage of the Delta launching rocket, demonstrating that, like any program, SDI has its share of errors. The BEAR test (Beam Experiment Aboard Rocket) was delayed by a launch failure, but eventually demonstrated the operation of a low-power experimental particle beam in space. The Kinetic Kill Vehicle, the heart of the SBI concept, was tested in a 21-second duration hover inside a hangar in May, and again in mid-summer. In the second test, its sensor observed the burning of a strapped-down rocket nearby, and successfully "handed off" from the rocket flame to a simulation of the missile itself, which the SBI would have to hit. While SDIO touted its results in these tests, they are all basic research experiments, not developmental tests with the earmarks of a program that will be deployed in less than a decade.

POLITICS AND BUDGETS

Ronald Reagan's unswerving commitment to his SDI dream provided substantial political protection for the program through SDI's first few years. But last year's defense bill saw SDI's smallest increase in funding since the program's inception, a sign that congressional support had eroded from its previous peaks. And by the end of 1988, even the Reagan administration was no longer as generous toward SDI funding as it has been. While once the Reagan administration had expected to request $8.7 billion in Fiscal Year 1990 Department of Defense funding for SDI, budget stringency forced a reduction in proposed SDI funding down to $5.6 billion.

The presidential campaign produced some heat but little light on SDI. Michael Dukakis opposed near-term deployment, while then-Vice President Bush gave strong support to the program. But soon after the election, Bush selected Brent Scowcroft, a known SDI critic, as his national security adviser. As long ago as March 1984, one year after President Reagan's televised SDI speech, Scowcroft had written to the President that "no move in the direction of the deployment of active defense should be made without the most careful consideration of possible strategic and arms control implications . . . the strategic implications of ballistic missile defense and the criticality of the ABM Treaty to further arms control agreements dictate extreme caution to proceeding to engineering development in this sensitive area." In 1988, Scowcroft and three colleagues from the Aspen Strategy Group condemned much of the current structure of the SDI program, rejecting near-term deployment and endorsing the ABM Treaty in its traditional interpretation.

The appointment of Scowcroft presaged setbacks to come for SDI. In the end, reading the President's lips ended up not being as reliable a guide to the fortunes of SDI in the Bush adminstration as reading the President's budget, and here SDI encountered its most serious setback yet.

In the revised Fiscal year 1990 budget that President Bush sent to Congress, SDI was cut by $1 billion for FY 1990 alone, for a reduced figure of $4.6 billion. The Joint Chiefs of Staff and the State Department reportedly recommended even lower 1990 funding levels for the program. And this was just the tip of the fiscal iceberg that SDI had struck. Funding for FY 1991 was cut $1.3 billion, and SDI's projected budget for the five-year period stretching out to 1994 was reduced by $8 billion. This was far more than Congress had cut from the SDI program since its inception. With Ronald Reagan, SDI's patron and protector, out of the decision process, SDI has reentered the real world of budgetary restraints and hard-headed program review which it had been largely able to elude for its first five years.

The rhetorical abandonment of the nuclear "astrodome," the shifting of the technical focus of the program, the reports of JCS efforts to constrain SDI in favor of other military programs, and the cutbacks in proposed funding produced a very different eliminate in Congress for SDI. This was nowhere better seen than in the atmosphere of the spring budget hearings. The air of contentiousness and fervor that surrounded previous hearings when General Abrahamson testified was replaced by one of frankness and relative modesty, for which Senate panel members voiced their appreciation. General Monahan made no great promises for his program; indeed, he expressed caution on a variety of important issues.

As was true in the second Reagan term, the budget deficit has been arms control's best friend in the Bush administration, and this has certainly been true for SDI. Pressure on the defense budget has forced Congress and the executive branch to make wrenching defense choices that have led to cutbacks in many popular defense programs. Even SDI supporters in this environment have gone along with SDI funding reductions.

At this writing, the House of Representatives has cut SDI to $3.1 billion overall, or about $2.8 billion for the Department of Defense and $300 million for the Department of Energy (DOE). The Senate has approved $4.5 billion for SDI ($4.3 billion for DOD and $200 million for DOE), a $400 million cut from the administration's request. An amendment proposed by Senators Bennett Johnston (D-LA), Dale Bumpers (D-AR), and others sought to freeze SDI funding at last year's level, but was narrowly defeated by a vote of 50-48.

The House and Senate will probably split the difference on SDI funding in their conference on the defense bill, which would mean a compromise figure of $3.8 billion (including DOE funding), a reduction of about 10 percent (counting inflation) from last year. This $300 million cut would be the first time since SDI's inception in 1983 that funding would be lower than in a previous year, a major turning point in SDI's political fortunes.

Secretary of Defense Cheney has already threatened a presidential veto of the defense bill, which could give the White House extra leverage in boosting SDI funding. But with the Senate and House deeply split on a large number of major defense issues, President Bush cannot get everything he wants. Programs such as the rail MX, Midgetman, and B-2 bomber may well be higher priorities for such a high-risk veto strategy.

BUDGET IMPACT

In the past it has been difficult to gauge how SDI funding cuts would affect the program. Congress has rarely attempted and never succeeded in dictating SDI priorities. However, in a remarkable instance of SDIO glasnost, Director Monahan has in a letter spelled out for the first time how he would apportion various levels of congressional SDI funding cuts.

According to the Monahan letter, a 10 percent cut in SDI's five-year funding plans would force SDIO to consider cancellation of only one SDI program, the Extended Ranger Interceptor (ERINT). This is one of several antitactical ballistic missile systems under development. A 20 percent cut would/could lead to cancellation of the Exoatmospheric Interceptor (ERIS), the Space Surveillance and Tracking System satellite (SSTS), and the High Endoatmospheric Interceptor (HEDI), in addition to ERINT. While ERIS might be threatened, the broader program to develop long-range exoatmospheric interceptors as possible components of a Phase I architecture or an ALPS system would continue, under the aegis of the new Ground-Based Interceptor (GBI) program.

A 30 percent reduction in SDI funding would force SDIO to contemplate cancellation of many more projects, including the Space-Based Interceptor, the Chemical Laser, Free Electron Laser, and Neutral Particle Beam projects, and several others. With the Space-Based Interceptor and ERIS canceled, the Phase I architecture as presented last October would be dead.

But by preserving Brilliant Pebbles and the Ground-Based Interceptor, SDIO would maintain its focus on near-term deployment. Indeed, while Monahan's letter acknowledged that longer-term technologies would be essential to combat Soviet countermeasures that would eventually defeat a Phase I system, he explicitly acknowledged that at the 70 percent level, he would make "no provision for follow-on systems to offset Soviet countermeasures." This appears to directly contradict the direction of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who have told the Congress that they would not support Phase I without assurance that follow-on technologies will be available.

While the current five-year defense plan includes $33 billion for SDI, the chances are extremely low that Congress will provide the rapid increases in funding envisioned, rising to $9 billion by 1994. If we assume that SDI receives constant annual funding at the FY 89 level of $4.1 billion during the FY 1990-94 period, this would amount to $20.5 billion, a 38 percent cut in the five-year spending plan, deeper than any of the cuts envisioned in Monahan's letter. And even this level seems optimistic, given SDI's likely funding of $3.8 billion for 1990, and the likelihood that budget constraints could force further reductions by both the Bush administration and Congress in the next few years. As a result, SDI is in for major program upheaval even if all the technologies work perfectly.

Even the SDI funding now included in the five-year defense plan is probably insufficient to support a Phase I deployment based on the October 1988 architecture. With current budget restraints, deployment of any widespread defense is certain to be substantially delayed from current plans.

This highlights another issue that last year's Senate staff report on SDI identified: with the likely deployment date of SDI's Phase I now slipping into the 21st century, the Soviets will have more time to develop simple but effective countermeasures to Phase I. In 1987, SDIO acknowledged that if a Phase I system were deployed "significantly later" than the mid-1990's, it might not be effective, because Soviet countermeasures, would already be available. But SDIO is now planning on a deployment that will not be complete, according to JCS Vice Chairman Herres, until after the turn of the century—even if funding were available and all went as planned. More than ever, it appears that Phase I would be obsolete by the time of deployment.

Indeed, the first-ever cutback in SDI funding, combined with continuing strong support for the ABM Treaty, is a sign that Congress is very unlikely ever to provide the funds necessary for a widespread SDI deployment beyond the treaty's bounds. At the level of funding that currently seems likely, a Phase I deployment would be impossible unless Brilliant Pebbles could somehow deliver on all the promises its advocates have made for it—probably a forlorn hope, but one which likely accounts for the unusually intense interest shown in this immature technology.

After six years of debate, it is clear that Congress is willing to support a robust research for SDI but it is also clear that Congress will not support SDI annual outlays on the order of $10 billion. Thus the policy choice is between a good research program that meshes with fiscal reality or an inadequate and wasteful development program that continues to focus on preparing for a Phase I deployment for which the funds simply will not be available. The Bush administration so far seems trapped by its own rhetoric from coming to grips with the implications of the new SDI reality.

The responsibility for getting SDI on a steadier course toward more realistic research objectives thus seems to lie with Congress in the near term. Since Congress has been reluctant to earmark SDI research funds for specific objectives, it will take a change in administration perceptions before SDI program goals can be changed away from Phase I deployment. The only likely way this could happen in the near term would be as a result of a Congress-executive branch "summit agreement" on SDI objectives and funding levels. In the absence of such an agreement, SDI will be sailing under ever weaker fiscal and political winds and runs the risk of finding itself becalmed, working ceaselessly toward goals that will never be fulfilled.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

WHERE ARE WE GOING WITH THE TRIDENT?

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, a commonsense pillar of U.S. strategic policy over the years has been that our strategic weapons planning and arms control goals should be consistent. Yet our current policy of buying one Trident submarine each year through 1994 runs the serious risk of forcing us to dismantle relatively new Tridents worth billions in just a few years, or else leaving us with fewer ICBM warheads than our defense chiefs believe wise.

The problem is that we may be trying to put 10 pounds' worth of Trident into the 5-pound bag of START—strategic arms reduction talks. Under the START framework that both sides have already agreed to, each side will be allowed 4,900 ballistic missile warheads. If we maintain the same 70 to 30 ratio of submarine warheads to ICBM warheads as we have at present, which is what our defense leaders want, we will have room for 18 Trident submarines under the current START framework. Yet the fiscal year 1990 defense bill contains full funding for the 17th Trident submarine and long-lead procurement funding for the 19th Trident—long-lead funding for the 18th Trident was in last year's bill.

If we buy all 5 of the Tridents planned in the 5-year defense plan, we will have a fleet of 23 Tridents overall. And the Navy, which has refused to say what their force objectives are for Trident, appears to want more than 23. Under START, the 4,032 warheads on just 23 Tridents as currently configured would leave us three choices, all undesirable:

We could scale back our ICBM force to just 484 warheads, one-fifth the number we have now, leaving no room for any Midgetman or Minuteman missiles and even forcing us to dismantle 2 of our 50 MX's;

We could dismantle some of our oldest Trident subs, which were first deployed only a few years ago in the early eighties; or

We could be forced by the momentum of our arms programs to renege on what we have already agreed to in START. We would be compelled to renegotiate a higher START warhead number, dimming START's bright promise of major reductions. In return for this concession, we might well have to make a substantial concession to the Soviets in return.

Last year Congress recognized this potential collision between our arms control goals and strategic weapons plans when it called for the administration to report on "the implications such a [START] treaty or agreement might have on the strategic force postures of the United States," in the words of last year's authorization bill. The Armed Services Committee report this year also recognized this problem, calling for a study of reducing the warheads on Trident missiles. This is good, but it is not enough. We should have high confidence that there are verifiable and negotiable ways of resolving this problem before we gamble billions of taxpayer dollars on Tridents we may have to scrap.

This is why I am particularly pleased at the action taken by the Appropriations Committee in fencing the long-lead funds for the 19th Trident submarine in this bill until the Secretary of Defense certifies that the projected Trident construction schedule of one per year either "would not necessitate early retirement of existing submarines, or that the President will request a new production profile in the fiscal year 1991 budget which matches the United States negotiating position and prevents retirement prior to the end of the useful life of ballistic missile submarines."

The Pentagon recognizes this problem as well. But their answer is to have START solve this problem by exempting three submarines from the START totals, a major departure from past arms control practice. Such a step would erode the joint United States-Soviet pledge to 50 percent reductions in nuclear warheads embodied in the START framework. It would also significantly increase the number of nuclear warheads the Soviets would target at the United States because they would be allowed extra missile firing submarines as well.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the testimony of Defense Secretary Cheney appear at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the testimony was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TESTIMONY OF DEFENSE SECRETARY CHENEY

Secretary CHENEY. Right.

I am very aware of that, Senator.

One of the provisions that we're looking at—and I don't recall whether this has been agreed to yet; I mean, there have certainly been some preliminary discussions in the talks—is the notion that at any given time you would only be allowed to have three boats in effect stand down, in for overhaul, for resupply, and so forth, and that those would not count against your total sailings.

Senator BUMPERS. That worries me a little, too, because the Soviets always have a lot more in for overhaul than we have.

Secretary CHENEY. That's true. But if we'd agree that they count, except for three, that is, you'd allow for ——

Senator BUMPERS. That's three on a side?

Secretary CHENEY. Three on a side. They'd have to count the others that they had in port. But that would give us some flexibility in terms of deployment and managing the force.

Mr. BUMPERS. The Soviets have not agreed to this "three free submarines" position, and it is unclear how it will be resolved. But even if they accepted it, this bonus would be insufficient to offset the ICBM reductions that 23 Tridents would require. The United States could face wrenching strategic force choices within a year or two, unless we act now, which this bill wisely does. No one has more strongly supported the Trident Program over the years than I, but we must ask overselves if we are serious about what we have agreed to in Geneva. If so, then we need to ensure that our weapons plans and START's ceilings are consistent. I am pleased at the committee's action and I urge the administration to reconcile our Trident plans with the START ceilings.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the committee report language on advance procurement for the Trident submarine, a chart describing possible ballistic missile warhead mixes, a response from the Navy on the 22d and 23d Trident submarines, and an article from the New York Times entitled "Treaty Within the Pentagon Is Elusive" that describes the internal battle over how we should divide up START's 4,900 warhead ceiling between the Navy and Air Force, be placed in the RECORD at this point.

I thank the Chair.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMITTEE RECOMMENDED ADJUSTMENTS

Trident ballistic missile submarine advance procurement.—The Committee recommends $100,600,000 in advance procurement funds, a reduction of $40,000,000 from the budget request and the House allowance. The Trident program has been the most stable leg of the strategic modernization program and has been well supported by the Congress. While the Committee strongly supports the Trident program, it is concerned that the projected schedule for production of Trident submarines does not match strategic arms reduction goals.

The Committee notes that the 5-year defense plan for fiscal years 1990-94 contains long-lead funding for Trident submarines through the 23d Trident. The construction of this many Trident submarines would leave little room for ICBM warheads under the projected ceiling of 4,900 ballistic missile warheads. Most likely, this situation would lead to premature dismantling of relatively new Trident submarines, or force an increase in the ballistic missile warhead ceiling. The latter would undercut the logic behind agreeing to deep reductions and also allow the Soviets to have more warheads.

The Committee would not support building additional ballistic missile submarines, if that forces the retirement of other strategic submarines prior to the end of their 30 year useful service life. It appears that the forces goals for the Trident fleet require a procurement profile of approximately two Trident submarines every 3 years, instead of the one per year which has been approved for the past 7 years.

The Committee has included language in the bill which would not allow obligation of fiscal year 1990 advance procurement funds until the Secretary of Defense has certified to the Congress that the procurement of additional Trident submarines, at a rate of one per year as forecast in the request, is consistent with negotiating goals and U.S. policy on strategic arms reductions. Furthermore, the recommended bill language would require the Secretary to certify either that the projected schedule would not necessitate early retirement of existing submarines, or that the President will request a new production profile in the fiscal year 1991 budget which matches the U.S. negotiating position and prevents retirement prior to the end of the useful service life of ballistic missile submarines. Finally, the Committee language would require certification that fiscal year 1990 advance procurement funds are required to meet this adjusted schedule.

"TREATY" WITHIN PENTAGON IS ELUSIVE

(By Richard Halloran)

WASHINGTON, June 21.—Reaching an agreement with Russian negotiators to cut the number of nuclear warheads in United States and Soviet arsenals is one thing. Settling disputes between the Navy and the Air Force over which weapons will be eliminated is another.

As a result, Defense Department officials, Congressional staff aides and specialists in arms control say, the Bush Administration may have an easier time in Geneva than in Washington, where both services have been lobbying hard to influence civilian officials in the Pentagon and White House.

"Who gives up what and how much they give up is what the argument is all about," said a senior Navy officer. "It's an emotional minefield."

Part of what will be kept and what given up will be decided in Geneva. One issue American and Soviet negotiators are working to resolve is what limits, if any, would be placed on sea-launched cruise missiles. Thus, the Navy and Air Force have been seeking to have their positions taken into account before any deal is made with the Russians. But considerable leeway is expected under the treaty, leaving it to the White House and the Pentagon to decide how many ballistic missiles the Navy and Air Force would each deploy.

GETTING POINTS ACROSS

To get their points across here, Pentagon officials said, Navy and Air Force officers have been aiming at Defense Secretary Dick Cheney, who argues the Defense Department's case in the National Security Council, and at Paul Wolfowitz, the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy, who has been in charge of the staff work putting together the department's position to present to the White House.

The President's principal military adviser, Adm. William J. Crowe Jr., Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, has also been a target, as has Brent Scowcroft, the retired Air Force lieutenant general who is President Bush's national security adviser.

The second stage will come after an agreement. Depending on its shape, military bases will be closed, contracts will shrink and, presumably, jobs will be lost. Members of Congress are usually susceptible to such arguments. In this maneuvering, the Navy appears more anxious than the Air Force. The Navy fears that the retirement of older ballistic-missile submarines will be accelerated and construction of new submarines halted. Navy officers also assert that the Administration's budget support for Air Force missiles and bombers jeopardizes Navy programs. "We're being squeezed out," a Navy officer lamented.

The United States and Soviet Union each have 12,000 warheads in their arsenals. Preliminary agreements call for a limit of 6,000 on ballistic missile warheads, air-launched cruise missiles and bombs carried by bombers. Today, the United States has 8,100 warheads on ballistic missiles with 2,450 of those on Air Force missiles and 5,650 on Navy submarines, including those on a new submarine already built and scheduled to become operational next March.

If that ratio is kept, the Navy's allocation would be reduced over a period of seven years to 3,430 warheads. Since a Trident submarine carries 192 warheads, according to agreed-upon counting rule—actually, each of its 24 missiles could carry 12 warheads, or 288 per submarine—the Navy would be limited to 17 Trident submarines.

FACING EARLY RETIREMENT

With 9 Trident submarines at sea, a 10th in sea trials and 6 being built, the Navy would be required to retire 27 Poseidon submarines earlier than expected and to make the Trident requested in the 1990 budget the last to be built. The Navy has been planning to build 21 Tridents, arguing that the program should be continued with funds and warheads shifted from the Air Force.

The Navy has also been urging the Administration to resist a Soviet proposal to limit nuclear cruise missiles aboard ships and submarines. The Navy has limited interest in such weapons but plans to acquire missiles with conventional warheads "in the tens to hundreds of thousands," said one officer. They would permit ships and submarines to attack targets on land and at sea from great distances.

But an agreement to limit nuclear cruise missiles, the Navy argues, would curtail those plans because conventional and nuclear cruise missiles look almost identical; thus, which is which could not be verified.

The Air Force, on the other hand, would keep its 50 MX missiles under the draft agreement, each with 10 warheads, and either get 500 new Midgetman missiles with two warheads apiece or retain 375 of its 500 Minuteman III missiles, which carry three warheads each.

Under the counting rules, moreover, the Air Force could retain all 97 of its B-1 bombers and the 132 stealth bombers the Administration plans to buy for $70 billion. Older B-52 bombers would be retired or modified to identify them as armed only with conventional weapons.

Only the Air Force's 450 Minuteman II missiles, each with but one warhead and expensive to maintain, would be phased out. Richard S. Norris, an advocate of arms control at the Natural Resources Defense Council, put it this way: "An agreement would allow both sides to get rid of a lot of junk."

Mr. INOUYE. What is the pending business, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending business is the second excepted committee amendment, as amended.

Mr. JOHNSTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Louisiana, Senator JOHNSTON.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I congratulate the SDI proponents. It has been another good fight, I think a good debate, and they were successful once again in keeping what is, in my view, a bankrupt program with elusive goals, with elusive architecture, formless, without substance, funded at a higher level than the Senate thinks is proper, again, for bargaining chip purposes. The money we have spent in this body pursuing bargaining chips is incredible. We used to be told, and it used to be the substance of SDI that we needed SDI as a bargaining chip in Geneva, so we kept shoveling money at it, some $20 billion to date; and we still do not have a program or a purpose for SDI.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, I recognize that SDI has a lot of support in the Congress. Whether that support is defined in terms of a purpose, I think the answer to that question is in the negative. Nevertheless, the support in terms of dollars is there very strongly, and I hope now that we have armed the Armed Services Committee again with unrealistically high numbers, that they will be satisfied, and that we will not come back to still higher numbers.

Mr. President, there are now, I believe, two parts to the pending committee amendment, as amended, am I correct? My question is to the Parliamentarian, Mr. President, and I ask a parliamentary inquiry, whether the pending committee amendment, as amended, is divisible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending committee amendment, which is the third excepted committee amendment, the Chair is informed that it will take a moment to examine this particular amendment as it has been presented.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Parliamentarian that one part deals with funding levels, and the other part deals with the directed energy weapons, and I would purpose that the amendment be divided between funding and directed energy weapons and would ask that as a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. STEVENS. Once it is amended it cannot be divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator is asking if the amendment can be divided where the second-degree amendment was agreed to, the Parliamentarian informs the Chair it cannot be divided at that point.

Mr. JOHNSTON. And is that because it was amended?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, what I wanted to get a record vote on was the question of directed energy weapons not to be confused with the question of funding levels. I do not intend to relitigate that question of funding levels. I think that question is clear. If it meets with my colleagues' approval I would like to ask unanimous consent—and I do not make this request at this time—that we divide the amendment into funding levels which I would propose that we approve by voice vote, the vote just already having been made, and the second part, the directed energy weapons so that we can get an expression of the Senate on the question of directed energy weapons.

I ask my colleague if that procedure would be suitable.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, if I may respond, I believe that the amendment that was just adopted does not in any way affect the directed energy portion of the committee amendment.

So, in essence, is the Senator trying to reinforce the Senate's position on this?

Mr. JOHNSTON. On directed energy weapons I would like to get an expression so that when we go to conference we do not give away directed energy weapons at the behest of the Armed Services Committee. I think the Senate ought to be able to express itself on directed energy weapons.

Mr. INOUYE. As chairman of the delegation that will be sitting in conference with the House would my assurance suffice?

Mr. JOHNSTON. If the Senator can assure me that we will stick to that language on directed energy weapons in the conference, yes, of course.

Mr. INOUYE. I will do everything within my power to do so.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will my colleague yield at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Alaska?

The Senator from Louisiana has the floor.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, this Senator's vote on the directed energy item is contingent upon the level of funding. That was the reason that the amendment was offered to directed energy.

I will state that I will agree with the statements made by the distinguished manager of the bill so long as the funds are sufficient. Directed energy should get a continuation of the program that it has had. But if the funds go down below the figure that was originally in the appropriations bill then, as the Senator from Louisiana knows, I have opposed the directed energy earmarking and would continue to do so.

So I would oppose separating the amendment because I think the amendment now directed to energy I will support with the level of funding that is contained in the bill.

I would hope that the Senator will take our word for it that we will do both, try to hold up the funding level for SDI to the point of the bill at least where it came out of the committee, and that we will on that basis hold up the Senator's earmarking for directed energy.

But if it comes down to earmark, Mr. President, the funds in 1990 for directed energy research at the level of 1989, that would cause a serious problem in the other portions of SDI research and make the program in my judgment unbalanced.

I hope my good friend, the manager of the bill, will understand I join in the support of the statement he made so long as the funding level stays in the vicinity of 3.6 to 3.7.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I do not know exactly how to get an expression on this question of directed energy funding levels. The fact of the matter is that directed energy funding has been cut every year in the last 4 years. In other words, we have mortgaged the future. This is the only program that promises to really pay off for SDI, if indeed they can, and nobody knows whether they can, but they have mortgaged those programs. They have cannibalized those programs in order to get the immediate short-term payoff in order that they can make a deployment decision by fiscal year 1994.

Listen, if my colleagues will, as to what has happened to directed energy weapons: In fiscal year 1987, $853 million; in fiscal year 1988, $832 million; in fiscal year 1990, $820 million; and I guess if we get any figure less—indeed General Monahan has stated that if their original request which was I believe $4.6 billion was cut they intended to cut directed energy weapons still further.

They are trying to get the quick fix payoff, the political shmaltz. It is nonsense to talk about deployment decisions by fiscal year 1994, and it is certainly wrong to cannibalize directed energy weapons in order to do that.

So, Mr. President, I guess I have gotten one indication from the Senator from Alaska, as I understand it, that he would support the directed energy weapons at last year's level of $820 million, provided the conference level on SDI is $3.7 billion. And as I understood the Senator from Hawaii he will in any event support the level of the fence, that is the $820 million, whatever the level we come in in conference.

Do I understand that?

Mr. INOUYE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I think that is all I could ask for, Mr. President. So I yield the floor and I am willing to go with a voice vote.

Mr. INOUYE. I move that the excepted committee amendment, as amended, be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

The question is on agreeing to the excepted committee amendment, as amended.

The excepted committee amendment as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the third excepted committee amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 65 beginnning with line 16 insert new language through page 67 line 6.

Mr. INOUYE. I move its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will observe there is a preamble which is part of that particular amendment and it would be consequently out of order.

Mr. INOUYE. I wish to accept the ruling of the Chair.

May we proceed to the next?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next would be the fourth excepted committee amendment.

Mr. INOUYE. I accept the ruling of the Chair.

EXCEPTED COMMITTEE AMENDMENT ON PAGE 83, LINE 1 THROUGH 5

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the next excepted committee amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 83 strike lines 1 through 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the fourth excepted committee amendment.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Massachusetts, Senator KERRY.

Mr. BUMPERS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield for 50 seconds for a couple of questions of the floor manager?

Mr. KERRY. Yes.

Mr. BUMPERS. I was not here for the full SDI debate, but one of the things I have been curious about since we have been talking about SDI is the fact that every military planner—the most recent being Admiral Crowe, who for 2 more days, anyway, is our top military person in the country—has pointed out that SDI is not and will not be effective against bombers and cruise missiles. Considering the fact that the Soviet Union, just like us, is moving in the direction especially of cruise missiles, I am wondering if we have any strategy.

I do not understand why it is going to help us to destroy something that goes above the stratosphere and has to come back down when, as Senator MOYNIHAN has pointed out, cruise missiles can come in under the Brooklyn Bridge, and SDI won't do a thing about that.

I am wondering: Do we have any kind of a plan to build any kind of a defense system against bombers and cruise missiles, for example, let alone clandestinely introduced weapons?

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, we have funds in our committee bill and a section in our committee report for a program called the "Air Defense Initiative." That is where we have the principal research and development efforts for the advanced weapons systems and sensors to counter cruise missiles and bombers.

Mr. BUMPERS. How much money is in that account?

Mr. INOUYE. Right now, we are recommending $110,765,000 for R&D in fiscal 1990.

Mr. BUMPERS. In research and development?

Mr. INOUYE. Yes.

Mr. BUMPERS. And what is the current level for SDI spending? Is it $4 billion something?

When we just added this last $600 million a moment ago, what does that make the total SDI appropriation?

Mr. INOUYE. Is the Senator asking for the R&D for everything in SDI?

Mr. BUMPERS. Yes, everything in SDI.

Mr. INOUYE. We just voted on that. It was $4.3 billion.

Mr. BUMPERS. That is what I wanted to know; $4.3 billion?

Mr. INOUYE. Yes.

Mr. BUMPERS. And $110 million to defend against bombers and cruise missiles?

Mr. INOUYE. That is what we have in the bill at this moment for the air defense initiatives program.

Mr. BUMPERS. Well, Mr. President, here is what the committee report said on that. It said:

Unfortunately, ADI suffers from changing priorities, low obligation and expenditure rates, uncertain requirements, and pursuit of probably unaffordable air defense architectures. Therefore, the Committee recommends $110,765,000 for ADI, a reduction of $142,386,000 from the budget request.

We say the air defense initiative program apparently is in a shambles and we cut $142 million from the request. And here is a system that the Soviets already have. They have bombers and they have cruise missiles and we cut the money for the air defense initiative by more than half.

Mr. INOUYE. We did this because we are at a very, very early stage in the research phase of that program. We felt that it would be prudent at this early stage to be spending no more than $111 million.

Mr. BUMPERS. Would the Senator agree with me that in 1994 the President is asking in the outyears for over $9 billion for SDI and the Soviets already have a capability of hitting the United States with cruise missiles and bombers? Would the Senator agree with me that at least for the foreseeable future SDI does not really mean much? If we could deploy the thing today and be reasonably sure it was going to destroy every Soviet ballistic missile, we would still be very vulnerable in this country, would we not?

Mr. INOUYE. The Soviets would be very vulnerable also to our own bombers and cruise missiles.

Mr. BUMPERS. Of course, just as we have now and have always been and in my opinion will be in the future, if we have the most perfect air defense systems and the most perfect ballistic missile defense systems, there still would not be any reason why the Soviets could not clandestinely introduce weapons and plant them at the foot of the Washington Monument, would there? We cannot keep tons and tons of cocoa and marijuana out of the country. Is there any reason to believe we could keep them from introducing weapons into this country?

Mr. INOUYE. I also would point out to my colleague that, at the present time in this bill, we also are providing funds to purchase F-15's and F-16's which have significant air defense capabilities. The program that we have is to try to integrate all of these systems—the F-15's, F-16's, and the missiles. And the total program represents about $5 billion.

Mr. BUMPERS. I have no further questions.

I thank the Senator from Massachusetts very much for yielding and I thank the distinguished floor manager.

AMENDMENT NO. 887 TO COMMITTEE EXCEPTED AMENDMENT ON PAGE 83, LINES 1 THROUGH 5

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and I ask for its immediate consideration and that it be placed at the appropriate place in the current legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KERRY], for himself, Mr. JEFFORDS, Mr. HARKIN, Mr. SIMON, Mr. CONRAD, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. CRANSTON, and Mr. BUMPERS, proposes an amendment numbered 887.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

In lieu of the language proposed to be stricken insert the following:

Congress makes the following findings:

The United States Government relies on satellites for communications, early warning of attack, monitoring compliance with arms control agreements, and many other vital national security functions;

Such satellites constitute vital integral parts of many United States weapons systems, command, control and communications systems, and other military systems;

It is essential to the national security of the United States that United States Government satellites not be vulnerable to antisatellite attacks;

It is in the national security interests of the United States and its allies to inhibit the development and testing of antisatellite weapons by the Soviet Union;

It is in the national security interests of the United States to undertake a balanced response to Soviet antisatellite capabilities, which includes a measured Asat program;

Key agencies of the executive branch are examining options for specific antisatellite arms control measures, and the Department of Defense has concluded that the greatest potential for Asat arms control lies in limits on specific weapons and rules of the road for space activities;

The executive branch should conclude its examination of specific antisatellite arms control options and rules of the road for space activities without delay and include its recommendations and conclusions from this examination in the report to Congress already required by the conference report on the fiscal year 1989 Dire Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act;

The President shall—with a view toward considering how to improve United States Asat arms control monitoring capabilities—assess the national security implications for the United States of a mutual deployment of cooperative monitoring and verification technologies; the results of such assessment shall be included in the above mentioned report; and

The President should take advantage of the forum provided by the ongoing defense and space talks with the Soviet Union to explore—as a high priority matter—adequately verifiable limitations on the development, testing, production, and deployment of weapons capable of directly threatening United States military satellites.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I send this amendment to the desk on behalf of myself, Senator JEFFORDS, Senator HARKIN, Senator SIMON, Senator CONRAD, Senator KENNEDY, Senator CRANSTON, Senator BUMPERS, and myself.

This amendment is a compromise for the original amendment I intended to offer regarding this issue, reached between the sponsors of this amendment and the chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee and manager of this bill, Senator INOUYE. I am grateful to Senator INOUYE for his assistance and thoughtfulness in working out the compromise language, which we hope will help make possible serious negotiations on controlling antisatellite weapons between the United States and the Soviet Union.

On May 12, 1989, President Bush called for an expansion of the "open skies" plan of President Eisenhower, asking all nations, beginning with the United States and the Soviet Union, to open up their skies to surveillance flights and satellites of other nations. President Bush said we must "open up military activities to regular scrutiny and, as President Eisenhower put it, 'convince the world that we are lessening danger and relaxing tension.' "

The single most important means we have of monitoring the Soviet Union are our satellites. The biggest impediment to implementing the President's "open skies" policy are antisatellite weapons or Asat's. Among those weapons to be considered for development are land- and sea-based interceptor rockets and ground-based lasers.

Yet, ironically, at the same time that the President has called for "open skies," this appropriations bill contains what the committee describes as "at least $184 million in new funding" for a totally new antisatellite weapons program, to replace the F-15 MHV program that the Pentagon killed last year.

Right now, these funds will mostly be used for research. But in the long run, they can be used to develop kinetic kill antisatellite weapons and laser antisatellite weapons, intended to take out Soviet satellites.

As a result of compromise, nothing in this amendment restricts the movement on these programs at this point in time. There is no restriction here. What this simply does is express the desire of the Senate to see us examine the strategy behind our own direction in the development of our program and to measure where the Soviet Union is at this time in their program and to try to decide, through a debate, through an open examination of this policy, where we are going and whether we are heading down the right path.

Mr. President, it is clear that the decision to expend this money now has not been made in the context of a large strategic view about space and space weaponry. The fact is that this decision was made in the absence of any real strategic analysis.

Mr. President, I think it is important for us, in the interests of the security of our Nation, and indeed in fulfilling our role as a leader in the world with respect to the possibilities of arms control, to try to measure what happens if a decade from now all United States satellites at all altitudes become at risk from Soviet antisatellite weapons.

Today we have no position as to how to make our satellites survivable in a hostile environment. As we sit here today we are far more dependent on our satellites for command and control, for verification, for communications, than are the Soviets. And as we sit here at this moment in our strategic balance, we are, in fact, advantaged because there is no way by which our higher altitude satellites are vulnerable.

If, on the other hand, we proceed forward without analyzing the repercussions, in terms of cost and effectiveness, on the United States, of hardening our satellites or making them invulnerable or creating counter-antisatellite weaponry and so forth, we may, in fact, have done the very kind of thing we did when we put on multiple independently targetable reentry vehicles and found ourselves disadvantaged.

I would like to quote the Senate Armed Services Committee report itself on the defense authorization bill. It said:

A U.S. Asat capability alone could be a weak deterrent unless or until the nation substantially improves satellite survivability, jamming resistance, launch responsiveness and the way we approach satellite construction. Yet, while the administration has a program in place for acquiring an Asat capability, no apparent plan has been submitted to Congress to develop the other essential ingredients of a sound space control strategy.

It is not only the Senate Armed Services Committee that found that but, last year, the committee required the Pentagon to provide the Congress with detailed information about the cost effectiveness, military effectiveness, and arms control implications of various Asat's and that still has not happened at this point in time.

In addition to that, Mr. President, there have been a number of statements, one from Paul Nitze, one from the President's own National Security Adviser, Brent Scowcroft, which raised serious questions about the lack of analysis and the current direction we are proceeding in.

I reiterate, the language here does not restrain research. It does not restrain the current program. But what it does do is try to force the debate on the question of strategy and try to narrow for us a perspective as to whether or not we are proceeding down the right road and, if we are, precisely what it means in terms of other expenses, other strategies that may be affected, and try to put it into a larger strategic picture of our current posture, vis-a-vis the Soviet Union.

As the Senate Armed Services Committee stated in its report this year, "what is required [in considering the Asat program] is extensive analysis, planning, and debate, with due regard for budgetary realities."

The compromise amendment I have sent to the desk is designed precisely to make such a debate possible, Mr. President. It urges the President to negotiate with the Soviets on specific constraints on antisatellite weapons, and notes the concern of the Congress over the prospects for United States national security if such constraints are not achieved.

As the Office of Technology Assessment has found, the United States is more dependent on satellites to perform important military functions than is the Soviet Union. Current Soviet Asat capabilities are very limited. Our satellites face a far more serious threat from future Soviet Asat's if development is not halted now. As this amendment recommends, we must undertake a comprehensive review of the implications of antisatellite weapons for the national security of the United States. We must understand what the threat is from the Soviets—and how best to meet it.

We must undertake this review now, because we currently have scheduled testing of the next U.S. Asat, the MIRACL, to being as early as mid October 1990. That means that when we consider the defense bill next year, we will clearly face the issue of whether or not such testing is in the interests of the United States.

The Congress stopped all testing of the now-defunct U.S. Asat system for 2 years because of concerns about the potential injury to U.S. national security if both sides move forward with the testing, development, and deployment of Asats.

And it is not just Democrats or rabid arms controllers who worry about what will happen if we go forward with developing Asat's. Ambassador Paul Nitze was among those who lead the charge against the SALT II Treaty because he felt it did not protect United States national security interests, and he was chosen by President Reagan to participate in some of the most significant arms control negotiations of our time with the Soviets.

And what is the opinion of Ambassador Nitze, who spent 50 years in dealing with the hard realities of the cold war and nuclear weaponry and arms control regarding Asat's? Ambassador Nitze told the New York Times on May 3 of this year that the administration "should try to negotiate a ban on the deployment of antisatellite weapons."

That's right. Ambassador Nitze does not merely want to limit Asat's. He believes we must ban them.

The President's own national security advisor, Brent Scowcroft, recently coauthored an Aspen Study Group report which concluded that "we find it hard to identify a set of circumstances in which the benefits of using the limited existing Asat systems markedly outweigh the potential risks." Scowcroft wrote that "all scenarios involving the use of Asat's, especially those surrounding crises, increase the risks of accident, misperception, and inadvertent escalation."

As Scowcroft wrote in a coauthored essay for the Aspen Institute, "at high levels of tension, attacks on satellites could easily be interpreted as a signal of an impending nuclear strike. For this reason alone, a move of this sort would be foolhardy * * * the instabilities of this situation in a crisis would be enormous. Fearing preemption, each side might be driven to nuclear alert levels that were inherently unstable. An accidental collision of spacecraft in [geosychronous orbit] or an unexplained manuever could prompt a decision to attack the other side's Asat. * * * Like the prospect of a nuclear first strike that has so worried strategists, it would be a seemingly crazy act made logical by desperate circumstances."

In recognition of this problem, the lead editorial in the New York Times commented in July, "funds to sustain modes research on Asat's and to protect satellites from them are warranted, but testing Asat's against objects in space is not. Congress * * * now needs to renew that curb and encourage negotiation of a verifiable ban on Asat's." I ask unanimous consent that the New York Times editorial in support of an Asat moratorium be printed in the RECORD in full.

Mr. KERRY. Now in the past, opponents of restraints on antisatellite testing have suggested that we cannot allow the Soviet Union to possess what they term "the world's only operational Asat system," referring to the rather primitive Soviet coorbital Asat system at Tyuratum.

And frankly, I agree with them. We should enter into negotiations with the Soviet Union on Asat's, and one of the terms of an Asat treaty should be that they tear that system down.

But because the Tyuratum system has had no tests against satellites in 7 years, its operational status has to be considered questionable—just as we would consider questionable the operational status of any system we had not been able to test in 7 years.

Opponents of Asat arms control have also always pointed to the Soviet laser test facility at Sary Shagan, which the Department of Defense in 1988's edition of "Soviet Military Power," referred to as a "high-energy, multimegawatt class laser device, and pictured again and again in the Pentagon's publications with the beam director pointed at the sky and a giant beam flooding heavenward.

The opponents of Asat arms control have argued that you cannot verify what the Soviets are doing with lasers. They have contended that the Soviets are ahead of the United States in lasers. They have cited again and again statements by Pentagon officials that—and I quote, "the directed-energy R&D site at Sary Shagan proving ground includes ground-based lasers that could be used in an antisatellite role today and possibly a ballistic missile defense role in the future." (From "Soviet Strategic Defense Programs," October 1985, released by the Department of Defense and the Department of State.)

The Strategic Defense Initiative Office just last year in its annual "Report to the Congress," stated that "at Sary Shagan alone, the Soviets are estimated to have lasers for air defense and two lasers probably capable of damaging some components of satellites in orbit."

General John Piotrowski, head of the United States Space Command, has stated that the Soviets possess laser capabilities that could kill a satellite in low Earth orbit, would kill a satellite as high as 750 miles, and do "in-band" damage to those in geosynchronous orbit at 22,300 miles. Last year's edition of Soviet Military Power reiterated that the Soviets possessed "at least one laser believed capable of an antisatellite mission." And again and again, those statements have been accompanied by a picture of the Sary Shagan facility illustrating the site of these dangerous lasers.

The former director of the Strategic Defense Office, Lt. Gen. James Abrahamson, testified before the Congress in March 1987 that the Soviets are "clearly ahead" of the United States in ground-based lasers.

These public characterizations of the Soviet laser program have been a significant factor in congressional consideration of United States antisatellite programs, and in connection with the strategic defense initiative. However, the unprecedented opening of the Sary Shagan site by the Soviets to a delegation of United States scientists, journalists, and Congressmen on July 8, 1989, suggests that these characterizations may well have been wrong.

This delegation—which included three Congressmen, a highly regarded physicist from Princeton University, the chief scientist for the Natural Resources Defense Council, and several journalists—was taken by the Soviets to this previously secret Soviet research facility, and permitted to inspect the laser transmitter, receiver, transformer, and beam director at the Sary Shagan laser site. At the site, Soviet Academy of Sciences Vice President Yevgeny Velikhov stated that the Supreme Soviet's new commission on the military budget may even order the laser to be abandoned when it issues a report in the fall.

Remember, we were told that the Soviets possess "multimegawatt capable lasers," of a quality equivalent to or better than the MIRACL [Mid-Infrared Advanced Chemical Laser] under development at White Sands by the United States. We were told that the Soviets could use this to damage United States satellites—according to General Piotrovsky, even satellites in geosynchronous orbit could sustain some damage.

The reality, if the apparent facts of the site visit prove to be correct following formal, detailed inspections by our Government, is that the Soviet lasers at Sary Shagan are somewhere between 1 percent and one hundredth of a percent as powerful as had been claimed by our military.

What is the power of the lasers at the Soviet Sary Shagan facility? Well, according to the Soviets who accompanied the delegation, the most powerful laser at the Sary Shagan facility, the carbon dioxide laser, is capable of between 2 and 20 kilowatts of output, power ratings a tiny fraction of that needed to sustain minimal antisatellite capabilities.

At that power, the Soviet laser would have the illuminating power of a large searchlight—capable not of destroying satellites, but merely of tracking objects in space, which is precisely what the Soviets say they have used it for.

But were the Soviets telling the delegation the truth? Scientists who have studied the technical data provided by the Soviets to the scientists in connection with the visit, and photographs of the laser equipment, power sources, beam director, cooling systems, mirrors, computers and related technologies, say that all the information they have is consistent with these statements by the Soviets.

For example, the optical materials used by the beam director appear to be made of materials that could only handle the heat of the power levels described by the Soviets. Similarly, the cooling system shown the delegation by the Soviets appears to be large enough only to handle heat at the kilowatt rather than megawatt level. The computers at the facility are hard-wired transistors—not silicon chips—of 1960's vintage. The Soviets contended that their military establishment lost interest in the facility with the signing of the ABM Treaty in 1972, and have done little with it since. There is no technology at the site that would indicate the contrary.

But could the Soviets have been deceiving the delegation? Did they show the delegation some fake site, while they are maintaining their lasers elsewhere? The problem with that theory is that the site visited corresponded exactly to the very buildings at Sary Shagan which were pictured in edition after edition of Soviet Military Power and other Pentagon publications, as the booklet I have here shows. If you look at the booklet on the United States "Strategic Defense Initiative," published by the SDIO, the illustration of Sary Shagan shows three buildings associated with the Soviet laser program. The delegation visited all three, and went wherever they wanted, viewing everything from power sources to beam directors to mirrors and optics to cooling systems.

R. Jeffrey Smith of the Washington Post was among those who visited the Sary Shagan site. As he wrote in an article which appeared this past Sunday in the Post, "how did we know this was indeed the legendary Sary Shagan laser? The Pentagon's sketches, apparently drawn from satellite photos, were a perfect match. Did we see the whole thing? Some of us counted steps to verify that most of the building was open to our inspection, including the computer center and—at our spontaneous request—the basement power supply."

According to Smith, "the highlight was scrambling over the laser's 'beam director' and peering through the mirrors of this alleged satellite killer, which the visiting scientists said were incapable of focusing more than normal solar heat on objects in outer space."

Smith wrote, "not only did this military dog not bark, it seemed to be on its last legs. Velikhov said out of earshot of the managers that he hoped their marginal endeavor would be eliminated from the budget later this year by a vote of the Supreme Soviet."

Smith then quoted an unnamed U.S. military official, who asked not to be identified, who told Smith that the Pentagon's mistake was "to draw exaggerated conclusions from sketchy information about Sary Shagan, and then print its reports with language that could be readily misunderstood. Smith quoted this current U.S. official as saying, "a lot of [news] stories said it could destroy satellites, and that's certainly not true."

Here's a United States military official saying anonymously what the Defense Department has not been willing to say publicly—that reports that the Soviet facility at Sary Shagan could destroy satellites are "certainly not true."

Instead of lasers with the ability to damage our satellites, the delegation saw what the New York Times editorial called a laser: "better suited for guiding shoppers to Count Potemkin's used car lot than for destroying U.S. satellites."

The information from the Sary Shagan site visit forces us to gaze at an issue some might wish to avoid—whether past assessments of the Soviet laser program indeed significantly overestimated the military capability of the lasers themselves and of the program overall. If the information provided in the course of the site visit proves to be correct, it suggests either an intelligence failure of substantial proportions, or the political manipulation of intelligence to influence public debate.

Whether intelligence failure or a case of threat inflation by policymakers, the implications are profound. If the Soviet laser program is as primitive as it appears to be, it undermines the very foundation of the rationale for the billions we have spent on the strategic defense initiative and the current crash program that is being pushed for directed energy antisatellite weapons.

The implications for verification are also profound. For a number of years, I have advocated that the United States seek to negotiate a comprehensive verification accord with the Soviets to establish overall procedures for verifying all relevant military technologies.

I remember when in 1984, the Congress passed an amendment prohibiting antisatellite weapons tests until the President certified that he had entered into negotiations with the Soviets on the strictest possible controls on antisatellite weapons, because we were so concerned about the effect on our satellites if the arms race went forward.

The executive branch never entered those negotiations. Instead, they took the position that no antisatellite weapon agreement was in the interests of the United States, because no agreement was verifiable. Accordingly, they certified that no controls were possible, no negotiations necessary, and they went and tested the MHV Asat until Congress passed a moratorium.

The importance of the new Soviet attitude cannot be underestimated. The Reagan administration, in rejecting Asat arms control, said the chief reason we could not negotiate such a treaty was because we could never verify it. Now, the Soviets are saying to us—we are ready to join you at the bargaining table on antisatellite weapons, and we are already willing to open up our most significant military test sites to demonstrate our openness to verification.

As the Senate Armed Services Committee has recognized in its report, it is increasingly clear that the Soviet Union may be willing to accept the principle of onsite inspection as part of verification, to supplement national technical means. They accepted this principle in the INF Treaty, and they are demonstrating the probability of their accepting it in the realm of Asat's by opening up Sary Shagan in this dramatic way.

We shouldn't accept the testimony of the Soviets on the capability of their lasers at Sary Shagan. We should not even accept the testimony of the U.S. scientists who went on the trip. We should test the Soviets directly, by insisting on further inspections of all suspect Soviet laser test sites, by our best trained military and intelligence analysts. If the statements made by the Soviets about Sary Shagan are not true, the Soviets should pay the price for seeking to mislead us. If they are, we should recognize reality and not base our own military programs on an inflated assessment of the Soviet threat.

Some here will say that the Soviets do have more powerful lasers—that the Americans were duped by being sent to the wrong site—that somewhere else, the Soviets have more modern, powerful lasers which are usable as weapons.

Well, if that is true, all the more reason to ask the Soviets for onsite inspections on a government-to-government basis.

No one can predict what course events may take in the Soviet Union. But it is clear that there are opportunities for the United States now to achieve limits on the threat to the United States from the Soviets. We should take advantage of glasnost first to monitor Soviet military research and development programs in the area of lasers and then to secure limits on Soviet military developments in the area of antisatellite weaponry. We should push for the dismantlement of the one primitive Soviet Asat system that exists, the coorbital system, and we should begin negotiations banning the development, testing and production of Asat's, with strict verification provisions, including onsite inspections.

While no single arms control measure can rid us of all Soviet antisatellite threats, even limited forms of restraint could protect U.S. satellites, and reduce the risk that the use of Asat's could initiate or escalate a crisis and threaten the security of our Nation.

I thank the distinguished manager of this bill for working out this compromise agreement, which I hope will make a modest contribution to pushing forward antisatellite arms control.

EXHIBIT 1

Congress this week will consider a Bush Administration request to begin testing a laser weapon for disabling or destroying satellites in orbit. But the U.S. depends on satellites for military communication far more than the Soviets do. That makes a competition in anti-satellite weapons potentially self-defeating.

Funds to sustain modest research on ASAT's and to protect satellites from them are warranted, but testing ASAT's against objects in space is not. Congress has banned such tests since 1985. It now needs to renew that curb and encourage negotiation of a verifiable ban with the Soviets.

The Pentagon seeks more than $200 million for ASAT's. It also wants to begin testing the Mid-Infrared Advanced Chemical Laser, or MIRACL, a beam of light generated on earth and focused by mirrors at a satellite in space.

Congress has long appreciated the risks that anti-satellite weapons pose to American communications. So have the armed services, which have never quite believed in MIRACL's, or other ASAT's. But they are now pressed by Star Wars enthusiasts to test some weapons—any weapons—in space. These advocates are looking for ways to circumvent testing restrictions in the Antiballistic Missile Treaty. And killing satellites exploits many of the same technologies used to intercept missiles.

ASAT's are needed, proponents say, to deter a Soviet ASAT threat against U.S. satellites. Never mind that the primitive Soviet ASAT can't reach most U.S. satellites, or that Moscow has refrained from testing it since 1983. Never mind that the most effective counter to a Soviet ASAT would be to protect U.S. satellites, not to threaten Soviet satellites. And never mind that the Soviets seems eager to close off this area of military competition by treaty. The Soviets are ahead in ASAT's, the ASAT lobby claims, so the U.S. must catch up.

The Pentagon says Soviet gains on ground-based lasers require U.S. tests now. They warn of a laser "with some capability to attack U.S. satellites." This month, American experts saw this vaunted Soviet laser with their own eyes and found it better suited for guiding shoppers to Count Potemkin's used car lot than for destroying U.S. satellites.

The House Armed Services Committee has approved a bill granting the Pentagon's funding request but barring space tests of MIRACL without Congressional authorization. A separate bill urges President Bush to negotiate strict limits on ASAT testing and deployment. Congress would be prudent to pass both, deleting funds for tests.

Mr. JEFFORDS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. President, I would like to speak in favor of the amendment and commend the Senator from Massachusetts for his efforts here. I know both he and I would have liked stronger language. On the other hand, because of the progress that is being made in the area of arms negotiations, it seems more appropriate at this time, perhaps, to urge and to persuade the administration to include in their disarmament talks the questions of Asat's.

I believe it is important we do that, or, actually, it is correct to say we have more to lose than the Soviets do in this respect because we do have an advantage in the area of our satellite communications systems right now and, thus, the development of Asat's would be more detrimental to our interests than it would be to the Soviets.

I am also hopeful, because the Bush administration is working hard on other aspects, that they will consider the merits of the proposals we have in this amendment, to bring forward the Asat determination and, hopefully, come to a treaty agreement on that.

I wish to indicate my support for the amendment we have before us. While my colleague from Massachusetts and I had hoped to put somewhat stronger language before this body, but this amendment expresses the essential point that we wished to make—that the time is ripe for movement on antisatellite arms control.

The recent meeting between Secretary of State James Baker and Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze has produced some very positive steps toward renewed momentum on arms control issues. President Bush and President Gorbachev now plan to meet next year. The Soviets have indicated that they are finally willing to separate discussions on SDI limitations from the main START talks in Geneva. New methods of verifying limits on nuclear-armed sea-launch cruise missiles are now being discussed, and the Soviets seem willing to satisfy United States concerns about a radar facility that the Pentagon claims violates the ABM treaty. The Bush administration has also announced that it will no longer insist that a START treaty ban mobile ICBM's.

I applaud the administration and the Soviets for these positive steps. Congress should support these moves and encourage substantive progress in the arms talks to reflect these new commitments.

However, I am concerned that antisatellite weapons are being forgotten by arms negotiators. We now have a unique opportunity to prevent a full-scale arms race in Asat's. The United States has refrained from testing an antisatellite weapon [Asat] for the last 4 years. Two years in a row, Congress enacted legislation banning the testing of Asat's against an object in space, providing the Soviet Union also refrained from testing. The Soviet Asat system is antiquated, unreliable and has not been tested in more than 6 years.

Partly because of our superior communications technology, the United States is considerably ahead of the Soviet Union in development of satellite communications and surveillance techniques. The Office of Technology Assessment recently concluded that the United States is also more dependent upon its satellites for essential military functions than is the Soviet Union. It therefore seems to me that we should have an even greater interest in limiting the development of antisatellite weapons and instead direct our resources toward reducing the vulnerability of our existing command, control, communications and intelligence systems. Yet the United States and the Soviet Union have not negotiated on possible Asat limitations in a decade.

The unfolding of glasnost and perestroika in the Soviet Union have had a positive affect upon the Soviet leaders' willingness to engage in arms control discussions. Clearly, severe economic problems are forcing President Gorbachev to cut back on investment in military hardware and technology. Gorbachev's approval of a recent visit by United States Congressmen and scientists to the Sary Shagan Asat site is an encouraging sign that the Soviets may be willing to discuss the possibility of onsite inspections, a prerequisite for any verifiable Asat limitation agreement.

This amendment urges the administration to seize upon this moment of opportunity in an attempt to make substantive progress toward arms control and ensuring the survivability of our critical satellite capabilities. In the rush to make progress in other areas of arms control, we must not forget to protect the key to our defense systems—our satellites.

I urge my colleagues to support the Kerry-Jeffords amendment.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I support this effort by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Vermont to attach this important sense-of-the-Senate language concerning antisatellite testing to the Defense appropriations bill.

In 1985, 1986, and 1987 I joined the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts as a cosponsor of legislation to mandate a moratorium on the testing of antisatellite weapons against objects in space, unless the Soviets conduct a test. In 1987, we offered such an amendment to the Defense authorization bill. Although our amendment was not successful then, the House and Senate conferees on the bill agreed to restructure the F-15 launched Miniature Homing Vehicle [MHV] Asat Program to complete all remaining research and development activities not related to testing in space or production.

The Air Force subsequently terminated the MHV Program, and included no funding for the MVH in the administration's fiscal year 1989 budget request.

I was pleased with those actions, and was optimistic that we had made some progress on the road to arms control through our work on Asat legislation.

Unfortunately, this year the administration requested the following funds to develop an Asat capability. For directed energy: $15 million to Army Asat development, $275 million in SDI for laser Asat, $16 million to Air Force for DEW Asat; for kinetic energy: $95 million to Navy Asat development, $250 million in SDI for kinetic kill Asat, $38 million to Air Force for kinetic kill Asat.

The bill we are debating today recommends nearly full funding of the administration's request, and deletes House-recommended language preventing the testing of the mid-infrared advanced chemical laser [MIRACL] against objects in space unless such testing is subsequently authorized and funded. The Senate bill does tie two thirds of the Asat funding to certain reporting requirements.

In my view, the administration should be nudged not merely to produce required reports on Asat development and testing, but to consider carefully the importance of pursuing Asat arms control. That is why I believe this additional language is necessary.

Clearly, the Department of Defense places a high priority on development and deployment of an Asat capability. Indeed, former Secretary of Defense Frank Carlucci wrote in March that the lack of an Asat capability is the single most serious deficiency in the U.S. military posture. This renewed, energetic pursuit of Asat funding on the part of the administration puzzles me. It does not make sense to me in terms of our defense requirements. Rather, it appears to be an ideological leftover from the previous 8 years.

I am not convinced that an Asat capability would enhance our security. Conversely, the United States has far more to lose than the Soviet Union by entering an Asat arms race, as we have a far greater reliance on our satellite capability. I believe that national security would be best served by refraining from testing an Asat, and by taking advantage of the current climate in East-West relations to secure Asat arms control concessions from the Soviet Union.

Therefore, I hope this modest and prudent amendment, which is designed to encourage movement toward Asat arms control without inhibiting the flexibility of the President on this issue, is adopted.

Mr. BINGAMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I would like at this time, if I could, to ask the sponsor of the amendment a few questions and just clarify in my own mind the intent behind the amendment. I do not object to the amendment as I understand it, but I want to be clear we have general agreement on it.

The question I have really relates to what is possible in this area. I think all of us are anxious to pursue arms control where it is feasible and where the agreement that might be reached is verifiable. But I think that my concern comes down to one of the findings which is here where it says, "It is essential to the national security of the United States that the U.S. Government satellites not be vulnerable to antisatellite attacks."

Would the sponsor agree with me that it may not be possible to render our satellites at low orbit invulnerable to antisatellite attacks, the problem being that any ICBM, and a great many weapons that now exist, are capable of destroying low-orbit satellites and therefore those low-orbit satellites generally are not the ones that are crucial to our defense communications capability?

Mr. KERRY. The Senator is correct that low level, particularly weather satellites and certain imaging satellites would be subject currently to attack from the Soviet Union by, first of all, their coorbital, very rudimentary system that they have that they have not tested in about 6 years, which is a dedicated satellite system. These satellites could also conceivably be subject to attack from some residual capacity such as a missile or something, as the Senator has described.

What we are really focusing on here is the effort to try to limit the dedicated satellite systems, particularly because the residual satellite capacity would not have the ability to seriously threaten those satellites most important to the United States, and it is only if they develop a dedicated system that could get at the higher altitude that we would then be threatened at that higher tier of threat.

Mr. BINGAMAN. If I could ask the sponsor, the Senator from Massachusetts, to yield once more on this bill, is it fair to say that the main thrust of what we are trying to accomplish or what the sponsor is trying to accomplish by this amendment is to move the administration toward a more serious look at the possibility of negotiating an agreement that would restrict those Asat's that could reach the high altitude geosynchronous, the satellites in geosynchronous orbit?

Mr. KERRY. The Senator is correct, but let me also encompass it in, again, the larger language that I think is very important here. That is the question of whether either of us wants to have a dedicated system. That is the greatest threat and that is really where we are focused at. There are means of getting at this. I think the Senator is well aware of the trip that was taken last summer by a delegation of U.S. scientists, U.S. journalists, and U.S. Congressmen on July 8. This delegation visited the well-known Sary Shagan site. That is a site that has been consistently referred to in unclassified documents as a principal location of laser capacity antisatellite weaponry of multimegawatt capacity by the Soviet Union.

In fact, upon close inspection by that delegation, they found the most rudimentary transformer; they found in the very building that has been depicted in the SDIO photographs which have been used to press this strategy, they found the most rudimentary computerization, wire hookups rather than chips. They found a total output capacity that could not be deemed to endanger even low-level satellites.

That is an opening of a window of opportunity for onsite inspection for the measuring of power capacity and ultimately conceivably for a regime or protocol which allows us to limit the dedicated antisatellite weaponry that could leave us in the position of having superior satellite verification command and control capacity. I think this is to the advantage of the United States in our national security interests.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Let me just conclude with one more question to the Senator from Massachusetts. I guess my concern is that the capability that we have to verify an agreement that relates to the low-orbit/low-altitude satellites is not particularly great. For example, on SDI, we just had quite a debate on SDI systems.

I think there is no question that SDI systems have an Asat capacity long before they have an SDI capability.

There are many other weapons that potentially have an Asat capability. I certainly favor going forward and trying to negotiate what we can that is verifiable, but I think the problems are very great indeed when you try to verify an agreement that relates to the low-altitude satellites.

I just want to make that point, and I gather from what the Senator is saying, that is generally consistent with the point of view that the Senator holds.

Mr. KERRY. The Senator brings up a very important point. But it is one that I think, if you measure it against the other concerns here, is at least a manageable problem. I think the Senator, in raising the verification needs here, puts his finger right on the most critical element.

We have had a history in the arms control race of always putting verification as sort of the back consideration. So what happens is as we develop a new system, we suddenly find ourselves in arms control negotiations trying to negotiate a verification regime for a system that is stepped far beyond our ability to do so. And then we tend to get trapped, as the cruise missile brings home only too well.

What I think we are arguing here with antisatellites is that before we get behind the curve, as we are in cruise missiles, or before we get behind the curve, as we did with MIRV's, let us try to force this moment which is propitious with respect to the Soviet Union to try to articulate an adequate verification regime to at least limit the next generation of antisatellite weaponry which is dedicated and can threaten your upper level satellites.

I agree, some of the lower ones have a residual threat that exists today and, indeed, certain of the SDI components do contain a primary antisatellite capacity far ahead of their antimissile capacity.

Mr. BINGAMAN. I appreciate that response, and I just wanted to finally point out that I think the Senator is in agreement with me that our greatest concern, the greatest potential we have for agreement is with regard to limiting or controlling the possibility of an instantaneous attack on the high-altitude satellites and that, of course, is a goal that I certainly support. I intend to vote for the amendment.

Mr. KERRY. I thank the Senator, and I thank him for pointing out an important distinction of the process.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, the committee recommends almost full funding for the several antisatellite weapons research and development programs requested by the Department of Defense for fiscal 1990. However, 67 percent of the funds are fenced until the DOD complies with the fiscal 1989 supplemental conference report and submits results of a meeting this December on the kinetic energy Asat program.

The committee also deletes a House restriction preventing testing of the mid-infrared advanced chemical [MIRACL] laser Asat against an object in space until such a test is subsequently authorized and appropriated.

Senator KERRY's amendment puts the Senate on the record in favor of a balanced approach to responding to Soviet antisatellite capabilities. In my opinion, this approach is a "dual track" approach embodying both continued research and development on antisatellite weapons capabilities and increased emphasis on adequately verifiable, mutual Asat arms control limitations.

The committee required the Defense Department to submit a full report on the cost effectiveness, military effectiveness and arms control implications of its laser and nonlaser Asat programs.

We enforce this requirement through a fence on obligating more than 33 percent of any Asat funds if this report is not filed. We also extend the deadline to permit DOD to report on its critical December Asat meeting. We provide more than enough money to fund all Asat programs through January 1990.

Any prudent research program should plan for realistic tests to demonstrate the taxpayers are getting their money's worth.

We also can begin Asat arms control negotiations as well as carry out a reasonable Asat program until, and if, arms control limits make such a program unnecessary.

The committee heard clear evidence that the Soviets have an operational and militarily useful Asat weapon, even without a test of the complete system since 1982. That system threatens very important U.S. satellites.

The Soviets also have modest Asat capabilities inherent in their ground based lasers and antiballistic missile interceptors.

It is not unreasonable to pursue a modest Asat capability of our own to deter Soviet Asat attacks—or to deny the Soviets the operational benefits we expect their military satellites to give them in the future.

The amendment also urges the executive branch to increase its priority on Asat arms control efforts with the Soviets.

The committee's position encourages the executive branch to address the arms control implications of antisatellite weapons. This amendment reinforces the accomplishment of that objective.

I urge the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this amendment and the committee amendment be temporarily set aside in order that we may take up an amendment by Senator WARNER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 888

(Purpose: To provide for a feasibility study of land transfer for use as a correctional facility)

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk on behalf of Senator WARNER and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. MCCAIN], for Mr. WARNER, proposes an amendment numbered 888.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At an appropriate place in the bill, add the following new section:

Sec. . FEASIBILITY STUDY OF LAND TRANSFER FOR USE AS A CORRECTIONAL FACILITY.

(a)(1) The Secretary of Defense, in consultation with the United States Attorney General, shall conduct a study of the feasibility of selling or otherwise transferring to the Commonwealth of Virginia, subdivisions thereof, or any combination of subdivisions thereof, a parcel of land approximately 100 acres not more than 100 miles from the southern boundary of Arlington County, from the military installations within Virginia which encompass land that may be suitable for use by the Commonwealth of Virginia, subdivisions thereof, or any combination of subdivisions thereof, as a site for a medium security correctional facility for persons sentenced in the courts of Virginia or in the United States District Court in Virginia.

(2) The study required by paragraph (1) shall address, at a minimum, the following issues:

(A) Whether there are parcels of land within those installations of the size described which could be released from Federal control without severely affecting the present missions of such installations.

(B) A description of the parcels of land described in subparagraph (A).

(C) A description of the effects, if any, transfer of such parcels of land from Federal control would have on the ability of the Secretary of Defense to effectively carry out the mission of the Department of Defense.

(D) An analysis of the risk, if any, that might be posed to military personnel and their dependents housed on such installations by the operation of such a correctional facility on the parcels of land described in subparagraph (A).

(E) An estimate of the date on which the parcels of land described in subparagraph (A) would be available for transfer from Federal control.

(b) The report of the study described under subsection (a) shall be delivered to the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives not later than 60 days after enactment of this Act.

Mr. HELMS. May I ask the Senator a question? Where do we stand as far as MIRACL on this bill? Did you lay it aside?

Mr. McCAIN. The amendment proposed by Senator KERRY has been temporarily laid aside until such time as Senator WALLOP, expressing an interest in the amendment, can get over here and look at it.

Mr. HELMS. This is a subsequent amendment to excepted amendment No. 3?

Mr. McCAIN. By Senator WARNER. It has to do with land transfer.

Mr. HELMS. I have no objection.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I yield to my friend from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, this amendment requires just a study.

Mr. President, 2 months ago I was approached by a delegation of representatives of northern Virginia jurisdictions who have demonstrated to me a compelling need for the construction of a regional correctional facility. Northern Virginia, like most suburban areas, has experienced a remarkable increase in jail population, far beyond its capacity to construct suitable facilities on current sites. In fact, most correctional institutions in northern Virginia are housing approximately twice the number of prisoners for which these jails were designed. Over the last 4 years, the regional jail population has increased by 125 percent. With the initiation of enhanced drug enforcement efforts in the northern Virginia and Fredericksburg area, jail space will become even more scarce.

This creates a hazardous situation, both within and outside the institution. When jails are overcrowded, security within the institution is strained, the atmosphere is tense and potentially violent. Moreover, such overcrowded conditions invite costly litigation, ultimately at the expense of the taxpayer. A case in point is Prince William County, VA. Here a recent consent decree has resulted in closure of this facility on 10 separate occasions in the last 2 months.

When local jails are overcrowded, there is a natural tendency for violent offenders to displace those who pose a lesser risk. This, in effect, means that our courts have less sentencing options. While I support the general notion that our communities must explore innovative alternatives to incarceration for nonviolent, low-risk first offenders, I believe that with respect to those who defraud our citizens, breach the public trust, commit violent crimes or distribute drugs, swift, firm punishment is a vital element of deterrence. While the costs of incarceration are admittedly high, they are not nearly as high as permitting crowded jail conditions to emasculate our criminal justice system. It simply makes no sense to spend the vitally needed money for better enforcement and prosecution, and then have no place to imprison the criminals we catch.

To accommodate the burgeoning jail population of northern Virginia, I support the construction of a regional correctional facility. To keep this project within the range of reasonable affordability, I am proposing that a study be conducted by the U.S. Department of Defense to determine the feasibility of situating this detention center on public lands in the Commonwealth of Virginia, such as Fort A.P. Hill in Caroline County. While this facility is primarily designed to house prisoners from northern Virginia, I would expect that it will provide space for inmates from the Fredericksburg to Richmond areas as well. I understand that local jails in that area are either filled beyond or at their comfortable capacity. For northern Virginia, collectively as of May 1, 1989, there were approximately 900 prisoners in local jails actually sleeping on floors.

This regional detention facility will be operated as a joint venture between the State of Virginia and local jurisdictions. I anticipate that it will be composed of a consortium of resources contributed by Arlington County, Fairfax County, the city of Alexandria, Prince William County, Loudoun County, and any other jurisdiction that wishes to participate. Legislation that will become effective on December 1, 1989, will make these jurisdictions eligible for reimbursement of up to 50 percent of the total cost from the Commonwealth of Virginia.

A regional correctional facility will not only serve to alleviate the overcrowded jail conditions that hinder effective law enforcement in each of our local communities for citizens in the area in which it will be situated. While correctional facilities are always greater by citizens with mixed emotions, I join the representatives from northern Virginia jurisdictions in their belief that this project is a central ingredient in our future law enforcement strategy. In the short run, at least, the criminals are not going to go away. The only question is whether we would rather pay the costs of building prisons to hold them or the much higher costs of leaving them on our hometown streets.

Mr. President, the Senate has already passed this amendment once on the National Defense Authorizations Act. I hope my colleagues will join me in supporting this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, this amendment on behalf of Senator WARNER has been agreed to by both sides. I ask that it be adopted.

Mr. INOUYE. The amendment has been studied. We have no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate on the amendment? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 888) was agreed to.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INOUYE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I will be sending an amendment to the desk in a short period of time. First, I would like to describe the contents of the amendment and my reasons for proposing the amendment. I will be glad to provide my friend from Hawaii ample warning as to when I will be sending my amendment to the desk since I understand he will be seeking a quorum call at that time. I choose to let him have ample time.

I suggest to my friend from Hawaii it will take about 15 minutes for me to describe my amendment that I am going to propose.

Mr. INOUYE. Will the Senator yield back the floor to me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I cannot do that, I say to my friend from Hawaii. I have been recognized, as I believe is the right of a Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senator from Arizona does have the floor.

Mr. McCAIN. Might I say to my friend from Hawaii, I can understand why he would exercise the rules of the Senate at the time that the amendment is read by the clerk, but up to that time I believe I have the floor. I think it is very important to me and to about 20 million other seniors that I be able to describe my amendment. I say that with all due respect to my friend from Hawaii.

Mr. INOUYE. Go right ahead.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I am here with this amendment, first with a note of apology to my friend from Hawaii and to the distinguished ranking Republican, Senator STEVENS. I know that we would like to move forward with the Department of Defense appropriations bill, and I will explain, I hope to their satisfaction, the reason why I will be proposing this amendment.

Basically, Mr. President, this surtax that has been laid on senior citizens across this country must be repealed. Frankly, on October 1, those seniors who pay taxes ahead of time will be again levied another burden to pay for coverage that they neither want nor need.

The first time I proposed a similar amendment to this, Mr. President, was on June 7. It lost by a narrow vote of 51 to 49 on the Finance Committee premise that it would fix the problem that exists, which we all now acknowledge, by September.

Later, it became apparent that the committee would not act. I offered the amendment again before we recessed. I again narrowly lost, with the chairman of the committee promising, and I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, "We are prepared when we come back in September to present to this body what we think will be major changes in catastrophic illness."

Mr. President, the date is September 28. Tomorrow will be a shortened day, and of course October 1 arrives and, frankly, we have seen the Finance Committee and the House of Representatives in basically a state of gridlock over this issue.

I am also terribly concerned, Mr. President, about the likelihood now increasing that this issue will be attempted to be resolved in reconciliation, where those of us who are not members of the Finance Committee will have basically no input into whatever decision is made in the reconciliation process.

This issue is far too important to allow only a handful of the Members of this body to make the decisions affecting catastrophic illness insurance.

Mr. President, what have we seen in the intervening weeks? We have seen the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee chased down the streets of his own district by seniors; we have seen Members of our own body assaulted by similar sentiment in their home States. We have seen numerous Finance Committee sessions postpone taking action because they could not decide what to do.

Frankly, the reason they cannot decide what to do is they cannot bite the bullet of repealing the surtax. It is the surtax that is the evil that must be eliminated.

I also hasten to add it would be a terrible thing for us to deprive seniors of many of the benefits that we promised them when we do not have to. We have seen the commitment by the committee to fix this in September. It is not going to be met. As we see October 1 arriving and a new quarterly tax payment, thousands of seniors are going to have to make for a program they did not want.

Mr. President, I promised to be back. I promised to be back twice, and I am back again—I hope for the last time, because I hope at this point in time we will have reached a point where we can repeal the surtax, maintain benefits of catastrophic illness insurance, spousal impoverishment, and others for senior citizens who both deserve and need those benefits and which will be paid for by the $4.80 premium that seniors are already paying.

I am aware, although I have not been informed, that my friend from Minnesota has a proposal that will, frankly, not be acceptable to this Member, nor to seniors in this country, I will tell you very frankly, because it does not elimiante the surtax. My friend from Minnesota recognizes that there will not be any significant number of seniors who will support such an action until we eliminate the surtax.

I understand also I have another colleague who may have a perfecting or second-degree amendment on this amendment seeking total repeal—total repeal of the legislation.

Very frankly, Mr. President, around the country there are many seniors whose emotions have been stirred by certain special-interest organizations which I will not name, which are well known to all of us, that are seeking repeal.

I think that would be a dangerous course of action, Mr. President, and I will tell you why. If we totally repeal this legislation, we will be taking seniors out of hospitals where they are under catastrophic illness care. We will be depriving seniors of spousal impoverishment, one of the most terrible and tragic things that I see in my State from time to time.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on this point?

Mr. McCAIN. I will be glad to yield to my colleague for a question without losing the floor.

Mr. DANFORTH. I would only say to the Senator from Arizona that the amendment that will be offered by the Senator from Missouri does not do what the Senator describes. In other words, the spousal impoverishment provisions, the Medicaid provisions, would be maintained similarly for those benefits that have already gone into effect. The repeal would not occur until January 1, 1991. So that people who are now receiving those benefits would continue to receive them.

The repeal, the immediate repeal, would be for those provisions that have not yet gone into effect, such as the drug benefit and such as the part B benefit; and the provisions that have already gone into effect, including the hospitals and the skilled nursing homes, would be repealed effective January 1, 1991.

Mr. McCAIN. Let me say to my friend, he and I are not as far apart as perhaps some may believe. I again, as we have discussed in the past, ask him to give consideration to the proposal and the amendment that I am making which basically retains core catastrophic benefits, long-term hospitalization protection, spousal impoverishment, Medicaid buy-in the pregnant mothers and infants programs, retains skilled nursing facility benefits, with modifications of reimposing a 3-day prior hospitalization rule, increasing the number of copayment days from 8 to 30, retains the blood deductible, home health, respite, mammography screening, the so-called Mitchell drugs and hospice in return for repeal of outpatient prescription drug programs beyond the Mitchell drugs, and the part B out-of-pocket program.

I would suggest to my friend from Missouri that being able to retain all of those benefits with simply $4.80 that seniors are now paying is a viable option that I hope most of my colleagues will consider at the time I propose this amendment.

Also, let me point out to my friend from Missouri that we can pay for this proposal, as I said, not only by the $4.80 per month, but also we will have an increasing cushion of moneys paid for by the flat premium in the years ahead that will accommodate for expansion in costs of the program.

I would like to point out that under the present program the costs have risen from an initial estimate of some $31 billion to $45 billion just in the intervening year since the legislation was passed. And there is, of course, no sign of any reduction.

Let me also again talk about the issue of addressing the deficit problem. The administration, I understand, is not only opposed, has been opposed, and will continue to oppose repeal or even dramatic revision of this program not because they do not recognize it is a bad piece of legislation, not because they cannot see the continuing cost escalations and misestimates on the part of the committee when the proposal was originally made, but because of the fact it will impact the budget deficit.

I say again, since when do we make bad laws and support bad legislation so that we can use the taxes that we take from seniors which we tell them are for their benefit and indeed turn them into ways to disguise the real size of the deficit?

Mr. President, recently the Director of the Office of Management and Budget has gotten some notoriety for talking about now-nowism, how Americans only seek gratification now and are not concerned about the pain that may be caused in the future because of spending or other lack of savings and other practices that seem to be prevalent in our society.

I have to say in response to the Director fo the Office of Management and Budget, there is no greater example of now-nowism than to stick to a bad policy that seniors do not want in order to address the size of the budget deficit for 1 year, and now that the new estimates of the cost of the program have been revealed, the following year it will increase the size of the deficit.

So I have to say to my friends at the Office of Management and Budget the worst example of now-nowism is to disguise the budget deficit for 1 year and defend a program that the overwhelming majority of those affected by it neither support nor want.

Let me point out again, Mr. President, 4 months ago when I brought up this amendment the first time, no one, not the Republican leadership, not the Democratic leadership, not the administration, thought that there would be any possibility of change. Now there is a total admission on the part of all that there will be significant changes. The question is what are those changes? I suggest to you it is no one inside the beltway that has made these changes that has brought about this change in attitude in environment. It is the millions and millions and millions of senior citizens who are affected by this legislation who are outraged to a degree that few of us have ever seen in whatever short or long time we have spent in public office.

First, Mr. President, let me talk about some of the other proposals. The Ways and Means proposal—I am glad to yield to my friend from North Dakota for a question and I would like to say he has been one representative who has been heavily involved and concerned about this issue, and one who has been in close contact with the people that he represents. I appreciate the active role he has been playing on this issue.

Mr. CONRAD. I thank the Senator very much for his generosity and graciousness.

Might I inquire of the Senator from Arizona? Does the Senator intend to present his amendment at this time? In other words, at the end of the time that the Senator from Arizona describes the amendment, is it his intention to move to a vote on the amendment?

Mr. McCAIN. It will be my intention, I answer my friend from North Dakota, to propose the amendment. As he knows, parliamentary procedures are such I then lose my right to the floor. I understand at that time my friend from Hawaii will seek a quorum call. I then will lose all control of what follows.

But I am sure of one thing, I say to my friend from North Dakota. We will vote on this issue. I remember the two previous times. Once we spent nearly 2 days in a quorum call, and then the last time we spent about a day in a quorum call while various flailings around took place. But we will vote on this issue. We will vote, and we will see justice done. I have every assurance of that. I appreciate my friend.

Mr. CONRAD. I thank the Senator from Arizona very much for his graciousness in allowing me to get that question in.

Mr. McCAIN. I thank my friend.

Let me mention a couple of proposals. I do not want to take too much more time. If any of my colleagues happened to see the front page of the New York Times this morning, it is stated that the Ways and Means Committee was going to come up with a proposal. "Their proposal for cutting back protection under the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act would leave intact only reimbursement payments for prescription drugs as well as some health benefits for the poor."

I repeat that. "* * * leave intact only reimbursement payments for prescription drugs as well as some health benefits for the poor."

If that is the case, I suggest we change the name of that legislation to the prescription drug benefit program rather than the catastrophic illness insurance.

I received a letter from my friends, the National Committee to Preserve Social Security and Medicare. According to the poll that was recently taken on September 5, hospital and skilled nursing home benefits are rated as very or somewhat valuable by a solid majority of National Committee members but only 37 percent of the members rate the doctor and drug benefits as very or somewhat valuable.

Again, Mr. President, they have missed the target.

The Ways and Means proposal does not eliminate the surtax. It raises the level of the flat premium. It increases deductibles for various benefits under the program. It increases the obligations to this Nation's workers for Medicare, and it keeps many of the benefits seen by the senior citizens as less important than long-term care in place. It does not eliminate the surtax. Mr. President, the focus of the anger of seniors, I will will say over and over again is the surtax. The surtax is what needs to be eliminated.

There is a lot I would like to say. There is a lot more that I probably will in the course of this debate.

Let me mention a couple more items. "Greedy seniors," everybody has heard. I have heard responses from elected officials of whom I have the highest respect, and affection. One is, "They do not understand," which I will not even bother to respond to since there is no better educated, better informed group of Americans than our seniors. Second, "It is greedy seniors. Only the wealthy who are complaining."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this time members of the Coalition for Affordable Health Care.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COALITION FOR AFFORDABLE HEALTH CARE
(MEMBERS AS OF SEPTEMBER 22, 1989)

National Association of Retired Federal Employees.
The Retired Officers Association.
American Foreign Service Association.
Mail Handlers.
National Association of Postal Supervisors.
National Association of Government Employees.
National Association of Letter Carriers.
National Association of Postmasters of the U.S.
National Association of Postal Supervisors.
International Federation of Professional and Technical Engineers.
American Foundation for the Blind.
Florida Seniors for Medicare Equity, Inc.
Marine Corps Reserve Officers Association.
EXPOSE.
Rural Letter Carriers Association.
U.S. Army Warrant Officers Association.
National Association for Uniformed Services.
Air Force Association.
Non-Commissioned Officers Association.
National League of Postmasters.
National Treasury Employees Union.
Marine Corps League.
Naval Reserve Association.
Council of Sacramento Senior Organizations.
Association of Military Surgeons of the U.S.
International Association of Fire Fighters.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, the National Association of Retired Federal Employees, American Foreign Service Association, Mail Handlers, National Association of Postal Supervisors, National Association of Letter Carriers, Florida Seniors for Medicare, Rural Letter Carriers of America, Noncommissioned Officers Association, National Treasury Employees Union, Marine Corps League—these are not greedy seniors. These are not greedy or rich seniors. They are everyday hard-working men and women of America who have worked and saved for their retirement, and they now see an assault on their savings. I think they deserve better treatment.

Finally, let me summarize what I am seeking in the end, Mr. President, that I will propose. That is as follows: to retain the catastrophic benefits, long-term hospitalization protection, spousal impoverishment protection, the medicaid tie-in, and pregnant moms and infants program, retain skilled nursing facility benefits, but make the following modifications: reimpose a 3-day prior hospitalization rule which was in effect until this legislation, the present legislation, went into effect; increase the number of copayment days from 8 days to 30 days; retain other benefits in the act, such as the blood deductible, such as home health care, such as respite care, such as mammography screening, Mitchell so-called drugs, and hospice.

We repeal the remaining benefits in the act which are the outpatient prescription drug program, the beyond the Mitchell drugs and the part B out-of-pocket provision of the program.

Mr. President, the $4.80 pays for all of these benefits. It is a $4.80 flat premium, and it repeals the surtax. That is what Americans want.

Let me caution my colleagues again, if I might, if we totally repeal this legislation, it will remove benefits that some seniors are now receiving. I think they deserve particularly spousal impoverishment, particularly catastrophic hospitalization, as well as the others.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. McCAIN. I am glad to.

Mr. DANFORTH. I want to correct the Senator from Arizona. That is not the proposal that will be made by this Senator. There is no intention at all of pulling the rug out from under current beneficiaries. In fact, the program would be kept alive to cover them.

Furthermore, the spousal impoverishment provisions, the Medicaid provisions, the provisions that are targeted at poor people, would be kept in. My only point, however, is that the program basically is flawed, that our senior citizens do not want it, that instead of trying to somehow Scotch tape it back together again—and there are all kinds of proposals to do that—the time has come to start from scratch.

That is the essence of the proposal that I have made, not to deny benefits to people who are now beneficiaries of the program; we will take care of those people.

We will keep the espousal impoverishment provisions. We will keep the provisions that I think the older people of this country welcome. With respect to the rest of it, my idea is that the time has come to review the bidding, review where we are, and to start over again. So that is the sole point I make. I do not believe that the point that has been made by the Senator from Arizona is an accurate description.

Mr. McCAIN. I appreciate the comments of my friend from Missouri. I was talking about the overall generic repeal, which, as the Senator knows, is one of the options being considered by the House of Representatives, probably on Monday. Also I want to remind my friend, although we will have plenty of time to debate his perfecting amendment, or whichever form it comes in, that it does eventually take some of these benefits away, although it may not at the time, and also it does not retain so many of the other benefits which I think are important. If we can maintain them under the present $4.80 that is taken care of by part B, we will have plenty of time to do that.

Mr. President, I think this is an important issue. I apologize to my colleagues for disrupting the Department of Defense appropriations bill. I was very concerned, and remain concerned, about this issue being decided in the reconciliation process, where none of the Members who are not members of the Finance Committee would have had input into the changes that we know are going to be made in the catastrophic insurance legislation. I also appreciate the indulgence of my good friend from Hawaii.

Mr. President, I have an amendment at the desk and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. McCAIN. I ask unanimous consent to be recognized when the quorum call is rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? There is no objection. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SASSER). Is there objection?

Mr. McCAIN. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The assistant legislative clerk resumed the call of the roll.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I have discussed the matter with the distinguished Senator from Arizona, the distinguished Senator from Minnesota, and the managers. It is our common understanding that the best way to proceed in terms of expediting the Senate's business, and in fairness to all concerned, is to permit the Senate to proceed to dispose of the pending or the remaining excepted committee amendments and other defense-related amendments to this bill, following which Senator McCAIN as he has every right to do, would be recognized to offer his amendment dealing with the catastrophic health insurance program.

At that point, as he understands, we will put in a quorum call and make a determination on how best to proceed with respect to a second-degree amendment to his amendment. Senator DURENBERGER and Senator DANFORTH have both expressed an interest in offering a second-degree amendment to his amendment. There may be others.

If the defense-related amendments are not completed by 8 o'clock this evening, then we understand that those interested will reassemble here and assess where we stand at that point.

It is our common understanding and intention that no Senator will be disadvantaged or prevented from offering any amendment and speaking to whatever issue the Senator chooses to raise. Senator McCAIN has been gracious enough to permit us to do this so that we can move forward on the defense appropriations bill, which all Senators, of course, are concerned about proceeding with as rapidly as possible.

So I am not going to seek a unanimous-consent agreement. I merely state it is the understanding which we have discussed. I would ask if the Senator from Arizona would indicate if my statement here comports with his understanding of what it is that we discussed and agreed.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I appreciate the courtesy of the majority leader, not only to me but to other Senators who are interested in this legislation, such as my friend from Minnesota and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DANFORTH]. I think it is in the best interest of the Senate to proceed with the germane amendments. I appreciate his courtesy in arranging this schedule, and also the indulgence of the Finance Committee chairman.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I would say, so far as discharging our responsibility, it is quite important that we have a chance to evaluate this amendment. We had not seen it before it was proposed today. It is substantially different from the one Senator McCAIN had proposed before. It is somewhat closer to what had been proposed in the Finance Committee insofar as trying to arrive at a compromise. Having this additional time would give us a better chance to evaluate and see how we shall proceed on it.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Will the leader yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I want to indicate to my colleagues that other than the Senator from Arizona and perhaps the Senator from Missouri, we did not choose this particular moment to debate the issue of catastrophic. However, I must also say the Senator from Arizona has made it clear for many months that, at some point in time, given the prospect of failure of reconciliation, if that were in his mind a prospect, he would be here on the floor. So we all recognize that he has given us some substantial warning about his concern on Medicare catastrophic.

But let me also say that I do not agree with his approach. I hope that a majority of our colleagues do not agree with that approach. I hope that no one agrees with the approach of doing health care policy, Medicare policy, on a defense appropriations bill.

I will, at the appropriate time, later this afternoon or this evening, have an amendment which I would hope comes even closer to where the Finance Committee has been at its own determinations pending reconciliation than does either the amendment of the Senator from Arizona or the Senator from Missouri.

I believe that, given the time, the Senate Finance Committee would have come up with a catastrophic proposal on reconciliation. We are having now to consider the prospect of foregoing that opportunity on the Finance Committee because of the actions of the Senator from Arizona.

For that reason I am grateful to the majority leader for his consideration to the Senator from Arizona, to all of us who were in one way or another involved in process, because I suppose we could have stood here complicating everybody's lives, especially those here with their primary business. But as I understand the agreement enunciated by the majority leader it is the agreement to which all of us have been party and to which all of us will accommodate our own wishes.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, the Finance Committee has worked long and hard trying to establish a bipartisan compromise, and the staffs and every member of that Finance Committee, Republican and Democrat, trying to bring that about.

Throughout that process we were told by the administration that they preferred no change at all. At one point they stated they would support the staff report, which would have cut the cap to $400, and would have cut the percentage premium on the supplemental to 10 percent flat, which were very dramatic changes in that, but would have protected the core benefits in catastrophic. In all candor, I much prefer something like that to what the Senator from Arizona is proposing. It goes a long way, trying to do what we, some of us, think is essential and basic.

I think what we are seeing now with something like this offered on a Defense bill, which I disagree with, I think we are seeing the administration paying a price for not being active in supporting a compromise and trying to sell that point of view. And I regret that because we tried very much to bring that about.

So, this is the result of that kind of inaction.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I would state as I did in opening my remarks, I did not enjoy putting this amendment on the Defense appropriations bill. I do have knowledge of the calendar and that reconciliation should take place sometime next week. If there was an agreement for a freestanding bill that is amendable at a date certain I would be more than happy to have used that vehicle. That option was never presented as a viable one.

I understand the commitment and belief in the reconciliation process on the part of the Finance Committee members. Those of us who are not on that committee recognize we have no real input into a change, fundamental change, or any kind of change that would have been made in catastrophic in the reconciliation process. So I felt very strongly that every Member should have an opportunity to discuss and debate this bill, since all of us have seniors in our States. Seniors do not live just in the States of the Finance Committee members. They live in all of our States and all of us, I think, should be involved in the debate on this issue.

If there had been an opportunity for a freestanding bill I would have much preferred that than this method. I understand the agony which the Finance Committee has gone through. I have the deepest and greatest respect for what my colleague from Texas has been through, and my friend from Minnesota, and all others.

But let me point out we will, eventually I am sure, end up with a proposal much like this one, and that is the elimination of a surtax because that is what our constituents want. I happen to believe that we reflect the views of our constituents.

So I would again like to thank my friends and apologize for having to do this on an appropriations bill. If there was another vehicle I could have used which would have been more appropriate, I certainly would have done so.

Mr. BENTSEN. Will the Senator yield so I can make a point?

Mr. McCAIN. I yield.

Mr. BENTSEN. I say to the Senator from Arizona, with his thoughts in mind and what he might propose, I talked to the leadership on both sides and said if we could work out something in the way of a bipartisan approach, if we could arrive at some agreement insofar as the number of amendments that would be offered so we were not facing needles and whatever else someone might bring up, that I would be delighted to allow my colleague a vote on the McCain amendment. I stated that to them.

Mr. McCAIN. I thank my colleague. I also recognize that some things are not exactly totally under his control. For example, the commitment that my friend made that this would be done in September. Today is the 28th.

Mr. BENTSEN. That is true. I am fully aware of that.

Mr. McCAIN. I also appreciate his consideration and courtesy on that.

Mr. BENTSEN. I read in the New York Times an unnamed White House source said they were going to hold the chairman of the Finance Committee hostage on catastrophic until he agreed to some things on capital gains. I think we are reaping the results of that.

Mr. McCAIN. I believe I still have the floor. I would like to remind my friend from Texas, the administration and I have not exactly been in lockstep on this issue as well. In fact, I do agree with the distinguished chairman, the role of the administration has been sadly lacking on this whole issue, which I think has not helped us at all in trying to resolve the issue.

I will be happy to yield.

Mr. DURENBERGER. An observation based on what the chairman of the committee just said. It has been difficult during the process of developing a Finance Committee position to protect the interests of the Senator from Arizona since, as he says, he is not on the committee and reconciliation has its own set of rules.

But first the Republican leadership on the committee enunciated the Senator's concerns to the chairman of the Democratic majority. And, as the Senator from Texas just indicated, at our last session together on this subject the chairman of the committee made a commitment to all of us that Senator McCAIN would have an opportunity to present his amendment; despite whatever the rules may be, he would see the Senator had that kind of an opportunity at the appropriate time in the reconciliation process.

So, as someone who does not necessarily agree with the position of Senator McCAIN but who has represented to the committee that position as best as I could, and his right to bring it up on the floor, I must say the chairman is absolutely correct that he did desire to give the Senator that opportunity and did make a commitment to the rest of us that the Senator would have that opportunity at the appropriate time.

Mr. McCAIN. I believe I still have the floor. If I might respond to that, I am deeply appreciative of those courtesies. This is the first time I am informed of that. I am very interested to hear of that. It might have affected my decision to bring this amendment up at this time, since, obviously, I do not attend the sessions of the Finance Committee. I was not there. Nor did anyone relay that information to me.

I yield to my friend from Washington.

Mr. GORTON. As is so often the case, the distinguished Senator from Arizona has made exactly my point. From the very beginning of this session of Congress, he has attempted to get a vote on the merits of his proposal. And for one reason or another, not usually due to the deliberate policy of any other Member, he has been frustrated in that.

The opportunity to amend a reconciliation bill, which is so limited by the law and the rules relating to reconciliation bills, simply did not offer him the opportunity which this bill does and it was for that reason that he and his friends and allies attempted to move in this direction.

Absent unanimous consent, I doubt seriously that a reconciliation bill could deal fully with the full scope of what he wishes to do and perhaps what the Senator from Missouri wishes to do.

In any event, I simply wanted the body to note that the Senator from Arizona——

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I cannot hear the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will observe the Senator from Delaware is rubbing his finger over the microphone which makes it almost impossible to hear the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BENTSEN. That is a good trick.

Mr. ROTH. I assure the Senator it is not deliberately done for that purpose.

Mr. GORTON. That is often the way it is with members of the Finance Committees and nonmembers, and that is perhaps the reason the Senator from Arizona and I are here today.

In any event, I simply wanted the body to know that the Senator from Arizona and his many friends and allies indicate that he has never sought to do more than simply be allowed to debate his particular proposition, which is that of so many of the rest of us and so many of the people of the United States, on its merits.

Mr. BENTSEN. Let me say to the Senator from Arizona, I also agree that I will support a separate vote for either the Senator from Missouri or the Senator from Delaware, whoever wants to lead on the effort to repeal, because I thought they were entitled to that. We tried to structure it, but by the same token we tried to keep those things germane to the legislation. Of that I am surprised, because the Senator did have people speaking up for him there, and I assume his Republican colleagues would have advised him of it.

Mr. McCAIN. I thank the distinguished chairman and I yield, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware is recognized.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I would like to urge upon our distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee that we try to reach some kind of agreement whereby this could be considered either independently or as part of reconciliation, but if part of reconciliation that we protect the rights of Members like the distinguished Senator from Missouri.

I said on several occasions that I intend to offer an amendment calling for the revocation, but what concerns me, Mr. President, is that this is a very, very important matter of great concern to our senior citizens. The one thing that bothers me is that if we piecemeal this, whatever action we take, we may later regret it so that I would like to urge and ask our distinguished chairman, might it not be possible between now and 8 o'clock to see if we could not reach some kind of agreement as to how we would proceed, thereby protecting the rights of those who want to offer amendments and those of us—Senator DANFORTH and myself—who are believers that the appropriate action is to terminate the current legislation. I really am very concerned. We have already angered the senior citizens, and for us to act hastily now without giving full opportunity to everyone to have their say I think is a serious mistake.

Again, I wonder if it would not be possible to try to come to some kind of an agreement between now and 8 o'clock as to how we might proceed that would protect the rights of those who want to offer amendments and those who want to revoke.

Mr. BENTSEN. I will be delighted to try to sit down with the leadership on both sides—Senator McCAIN, the Senator from Delaware, the Senator from Missouri, and the Senator from Minnesota, and I am sure two or three on this side of the aisle.

The one thing I would hope we would not do is subject this piece of legislation to all kinds of extraneous amendments that do not deal with the concerns of the people that will have the benefits of such legislation. But if we could do that and do this then in an orderly manner where we could thoroughly explore the amendments and debate it, I would be delighted to try to do that.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator will yield, as the distinguished Senators from Delaware and from Missouri and from Minnesota know, that is precisely what the chairman of the Finance Committee offered a week ago, to do just exactly that which the Senator from Delaware is now asking for. There was no response other than the amendments today to the defense appropriations bill.

Let me just comment briefly on what the Senator from Minnesota said about reconciliation. I think the phrase he used was the failure of reconciliation. Of course, anything is possible and particularly something as difficult as that. As far as I am concerned, I am determined to proceed to meet our responsibility to enact reconciliation legislation. We have a responsibility to do so.

It is my hope and intention that we will attempt to do so, the chairman of the committee is seated there, all three Senators are seated there, and were made precisely that offer a week ago. No response whatsoever was made other than to come down a week later and offer the amendment here.

I join the chairman; I am not surprised, I am astonished to hear the Senator from Arizona say that he did not even know about that until just now, because my understanding of the discussion is that the Senator's view was being represented at the Finance Committee meeting, and the response was made to the Senator's view as presented by Republican Senators on the committee.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Will the majority leader yield for a point of clarification?

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Most of this went on outside the public arena. It strikes me that you are correct up to a point, and that is that the chairman of the committee was never able to give us on behalf of the Senator from Arizona the assurance that in the reconciliation process that he would be guaranteed a vote.

Any Member here might be able to change it. The promise or the commitment that the chairman made, to the best of my recollection, occurred early this week at a point in time in which the proposal by the Senator from Texas, our chairman——

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it was sometime last week. Perhaps the best thing to do is to try now to do that. Of course, we will not know if we can get consent unless we seek consent.

Mr. DANFORTH. Could I just enter into the fray here for a moment? I think we are making real progress. Here is the situation as I have observed it.

First, I do not know of anyone in the Senate who is better able to put together a diverse group of opinions and work things out than the chairman of our committee, Senator BENTSEN. I have had a wonderful experience on this committee working with him for the past 12 or 13 years.

In this particular circumstance, however, he has made a valiant effort to put together a kind of consensus package within the Finance Committee. That effort has been like trying to hold quicksilver in your hand. The harder he tries to squeeze it, the more the little pieces are falling out.

So as the days go on in the Finance Committee, the number of strongly held views keeps increasing and there are probably about a half a dozen mutually exclusive, very strong opinions within the Finance Committee. Those opinions keep multiplying so that now we have everything from repeal, which is the position that Senator ROTH and I take, to the administration's approach of doing nothing or as little as possible, to various permutations and combinations.

There is the McCain position; there is the Chafee-Heinz position; the Durenberger position; the position that Senator BENTSEN does not want to call the Bentsen position; and, who knows? Maybe in another day or two, there will be three or four more ideas cropping up.

So I think that the breakdown has occurred because the condition precedent to going to the floor has been that the Finance Committee somehow do what it has been doing the opposite of, and that is to form some sort of uniform position. I do not think we are going to do that.

I think, second, what has caused tremendous concern on the part of a number of us is that the fear that anything that is on a reconciliation bill is subject to a motion to strike and nothing else on the floor of the Senate.

I was there when Senator BENTSEN did say that he would try to work something out. That would take unanimous consent. The concern was the difficulty in getting the unanimous consent and also the condition precedent of trying to form some sort of package within the Finance Committee which, as I say, is going in the opposite direction.

Somehow we are going to have to start voting on this. I agree that it really should not be this afternoon, and probably not 8 o'clock tonight.

But it would strike me that perhaps the majority leader could set up some sort of sequencing so that we are not talking about sterile needles, we are not talking about other worthy subjects such as, for example, the completed account method of accounting or other things that might come to the floor of the Senate but limit it to the question of what to do about catastrophic, put together a list in order. Maybe we can start with repeal, then go to McCain and on to doing nothing if that is what we want to do, and see if we cannot get a time agreement.

This is not going to take, I do not think, a long time to debate. It really should not. Everybody has thought about it. Senator MCCAIN can state his position in 15 minutes. Senator ROTH and I can state ours in the same amount of time. I encourage our leader and the chairman of our committee to see if we could put together some sort of sequencing for bringing this matter to the floor of the Senate, perhaps without going through—it is in the nature of discharging the Finance Committee, and I do not like that idea either but we really are at loggerheads with it.

Mr. BENTSEN. If I might comment—and I appreciate the statement of the Senator from Missouri—on that last package, I have the commitment of the Democrats. I was also fully knowledegable on the point that if we went to the floor without bipartisan support this could not be done because it is a tough decision that has to be made on what is right. I fully understand that. But it is one that I thought we should have support on both sides of the aisle in order to be able to put it through.

Mr. MCCAIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FORD). The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. MCCAIN. Mr. President, I agree with the statement of my friend from Missouri. I think it would be well if we went about this in an orderly process. Also, if I could, let me help cure some of the astonishment of the majority leader.

First of all, Senator DOMENICI had a colloquy on July 27 with the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee. At the time, the distinguished chairman said he could not guarantee that the McCain amendment would be the last. I know the rules of the Senate have not changed and despite the good will and good effort on the part of Senator BENTSEN to allow my amendment, if it is objected to by any one Senator, that would require unanimous consent, of which I certainly have no guarantees.

I also wish to point out that the chairman of the Finance Committee said the Finance Committee would act in September. That statement was made on the floor of this Senate. I am sorry that they did not. That makes me move to act, however.

I should also like to point out to my friend from Missouri, yes, there are lots of proposals. Mine is supported by some 20 million seniors, a coalition of people that I have been working together with for 8 or 9 months. I am sure that there is probably a hundred different proposals how to solve this issue. I have been working on it since February and I have about 20 million seniors supporting my position.

That is why I am going to make sure, no matter what it takes, exercising my rights as a Senator, nothing more, nothing less, I get a vote on a proposal that is supported by an overwhelming number, millions of senior citizens in this country.

So, yes, there are a variety of proposals, and I have great respect for all Senators. The one I have is one on which I have worked with a coalition of seniors for many months.

The reason why, I will again say to my friend, the Finance Committee has not come to a reasonable conclusion on this issue is because, even though all consideration was given to my views, they have not come to the logical conclusion on this issue and that is the elimination of the surtax. Until they do, there will not be any conclusion. That is why they did not reach a conclusion in the Finance Committee in September as the distinguished chairman said would happen back in July.

So I certainly support the proposal of the Senator from Missouri and also my friend from Texas. But I hope that the distinguished majority leader is not astonished when my proposal was never put up for a vote in the Finance Committee, recognizing that it has been basically the same even though my friend from Texas thinks it is considerably different. In my view it basically changes from delay to repeal.

I again thank my friend from Texas and the other members of the Finance Committee for their valiant efforts. But, as I also said before, there are others of us who are not on the Finance Committee who have a deep, abiding and vested interest in this issue, and we view it as too important to be left within the purview of a committee that has failed to act for a long period of time.

I thank the majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, to my knowledge, no one has suggested that Senators not on the Finance Committee should be precluded from addressing this issue. I have not been aware of any rule, custom, practice, or tradition in the Senate that deprived a Senator not on a committee of relevant jurisdiction of the opportunity to address an issue in any form a Senator chooses.

Second, my astonishment was that the Senator from Arizona was unaware of the offer that had been made by the chairman of the Finance Committee in the Finance Committee. It was not intended as a reflection on the Senator from Arizona. I was surprised the Senator was not told about it.

Third, as to the Senator's determination to get a vote on this, as I said at the outset of this now overly long exchange of views, the whole purpose was, when I was asked to come in and participate in this, to ensure that the Senator's rights were fully protected, as the rights of every Senator should be fully protected.

Mr. MCCAIN. And I thank the majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is what we are trying to do. So I suggest, Mr. President, if everyone has had the opportunity to express their views fully, we follow the original intention, which was to permit us to proceed on the defense bill. And might I make a parliamentary inquiry. What is the pending business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending business is the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KERRY] to the language to be stricken by the language of the fourth committee amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. Accordingly, Mr. President, if I might have the attention of my colleagues from Arizona and Texas, then we will proceed as we discussed at the beginning of this exchange.

Mr. DANFORTH. Could I say to the leader, I wonder—I do not want to second guess the leader, but it seems to me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is going to ask that we follow procedure. The Senator has not yielded and Senators should address the Chair.

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We will have uniform procedure. The Senator may proceed.

Mr. DANFORTH. I thank the Chair. I wonder if it would not be a good idea to have a little meeting. Maybe the leader could convene a meeting and see if we can figure out some process of bringing this to the floor and se-quencing votes, because if this comes back at 8 o'clock, we are going to be exactly where we are now except 2½ hours later.

In other words, there is going to be a mad scramble for the floor, and we are still going to be on the defense appropriations bill. Everybody is going to try to hustle over to the floor with a second-degree amendment to see if he can get in first.

It strikes me that there really should be some fair and orderly way of hearing everybody out and then acting on this matter. So I hope that maybe we could have a little pow-wow on this.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am certainly agreeable to that. Of course, if we go to 8, at least we will be that much closer to completion on the defense bill. I, personally, will have had a chance to read the amendment of the Senator from Arizona, which I have not had the chance to do yet.

Finally, the other problem is, as is so often the case, we all already have a full schedule of meetings between now and 8. But I agree this is of importance and we ought to do it. I hope to discuss it with the distinguished Republican leader, the Senator from Arizona, the chairman, and others to see if we cannot figure out some way to proceed in a manner that is fair to all individual Senators and all points of view. I thank the Senator and I thank my colleagues.

I yield the floor, Mr. President.

MEDICARE CATASTROPHIC COVERAGE ACT

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I think we can all agree that the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act has become something more than we bargained for. The rising cost estimates make it virtually impossible for us to make an educated decision and, rather than take a wild stab at a catastrophic insurance program, we should stop and take a good look at what we are doing.

I would like to see this committee repeal the act and start again. Maybe we should look at a different approach, but let us admit we made a mistake. Unfortunately, it is at the expense of the senior citizens.

When the law passed last year, it constituted the single largest expansion of a federal social program since Medicare was created in 1965, and now the cost has far exceeded original expectations of $30 billion.

I remember discussing this issue on the Senate floor back in October 1987. I expressed several concerns as to what the projections were for future years. Specifically, I questioned whether this bill would open up incentives to pour more benefits into catastrophic costs. I questioned whether this would ultimately lead to cost controls and rationing of the available medical products to the beneficiaries. It seems to me this is exactly the direction we are heading.

At that time, Mr. President, I questioned my colleagues as to where we would end up in 10–15 years, concerned that we would have more Federal involvement and the Federal Government paying for medical programs that it cannot afford.

The point was also raised, I believe by Senator ARMSTRONG, that there will be pressure to find revenues from other sources and the issue of self-financing would be eliminated. Many were concerned as to what this would do to the Federal budget.

Mr. President, I voted against this program, and as I stated then, it was not because I was unconcerned about the problems many Americans face with catastrophic illness. It was because we had no idea what this program would become in 5 years. And now, the cost estimates are staggering.

I realize that there are some very good benefits in this program; however, because of the problems with the Catastrophic Coverage Act, I believe we should repeal it and start again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. I wonder if the Senator from Idaho is aware of a very fine editorial I have run across published in the Idaho Press Tribune on Tuesday, September 26, 1989, saying "Symms was right." Is the Senator familiar with that?

Mr. SYMMS. I have seen that.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, it is an excellent editorial concerning catastrophic insurance. I ask unanimous consent that this editorial from the above stated newspaper be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Idaho Press-Tribune, Sept. 26, 1989]

SYMMS WAS RIGHT

When the 1988 Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act was passed by Congress last year it was touted as a great step forward in providing insurance to cover catastrophic illnesses among the nation's elderly.

In fact, at the time, a vote against the act was seen by many as a vote denouncing motherhood and apple pie.

Well, all that's changed. Congress is currently trying to alter the act to meet a growing and meaningful dissatisfaction with it from the nation's elderly.

And we remember 10 senators who had the intestinal fortitude to say "no," one of them being Idaho's Republican Sen. Steve Symms.

Symms voted against the measure, and now it appears that many others in Congress wish they too had just said no.

The act set up new protections for costly catastrophic illnesses, and among its provisions is a requirement mandating some 40 percent of recipients to pay a premium of $800 per person. These 40 percent are the more affluent elderly but by no means should "affluent" be interpreted as wealthy. Rather, they are seniors with some money, but most are not rich. The premium is used to build up reserve funds, and pay the costs of the program for the poorer elderly.

Many of the elderly maintain that is unfair, that they are paying more than the value of the insurance, a contention substantiated by the Congressional Budget Office. They also argue that the legislation fails to provide protection against the costs of long-term nursing home care, which is really what most seniors fear.

Symms said so and voted accordingly even though at the time he was accused of being anti-senior citizen. Now, advocacy groups for the elderly across the U.S. have organized a strong campaign against the plan.

Symms is calling for the complete repeal of the act. "I believe that the current program, the so-called catastrophic health care plan, is a catastrophe. I also believe that we can provide protection for all age groups from true catastrophic illness if we just back up and start over."

Symms was right in 1988 and he's right this year.

Hopefully, Congress will repeal this misguided plan, and devise one that is fair to most (fair to all is never possible), one that actually offers protection against seniors truly fear and one in which the cost of the users more fairly reflects who is getting what benefits.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Kerry amendment and the underlying four excepted committee amendments be temporarily set aside, in order that we may take up an amendment to be proposed by Senator METZENBAUM.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, on May 29, 1989, President Bush proposed the return of 30,000 U.S. troops from Europe as part of the NATO negotiating position at conventional forces reduction talks in Geneva. The President also said that talks should be speeded up and that we should have an agreement by May 1990, at the latest.

The President said his plan would dramatically increase stability on the continent and transform the military map of Europe.

I support the President because I believe that when he was saying that there should be a return of 30,000 United States troops from Europe as part of that negotiating position, he was right. When he said that the talks should be speeded up and that we should have an agreement by May 1990 at the latest, he was right.

It is time to reduce our force levels in Europe. It is time that the European began paying their own way. We have been trying for 22 years to persuade our allies to accept a greater share of the burden in providing for their own defense.

Mr. President, we will hear today, "Senator, there is merit to what you are saying. We do not take issue with the substance or the thrust of your amendment but this is not the time."

Mr. President, this amendment would do exactly what we have been talking about doing for 22 years and that is to require our allies to accept a greater share of the burden in providing for their own defense.

In the event we are unable to reach a CFE force reduction agreement by October 1, 1990, as the President requested, this amendment would bring those 30,000 troops home—and I emphasize the "unless"—unless our allies agree to pay the cost associated with stationing them there in Europe.

It is time for our allies to pay their own way. If they refuse, we should bring our troops home.

This amendment is simple. It is about fairness. For over four decades, the taxpayers of the United States have paid more money out of their pockets for the defense of Europe than all of the taxpayers in Europe combined. I want to repeat that. For over 40 years, the taxpayers of our country have paid more money to defend the Europeans than all the taxpayers in the European community together have paid.

Our presence in Europe cost the United States taxpayers $150 billion to $170 billion every single year.

In 1986, we spent $1,164 per capita on defense while our allies and partners spent an average of only $324—$1,164 we paid, $324 they paid, as far as the defense of our countries are concerned.

We have defense responsibilities that go beyond the North Atlantic Treaty area, and our greater spending reflects that. Nevertheless, 60 percent of our defense spending goes to defend Europe, $170 billion. That comes to $693 for every American man, woman, and child.

That amount alone is just to defend Europe. That is more than double the $324 the average European spends to defend his or her own country.

These figures are not my figures. These figures are not made up by some author who is writing an article. These figures did not come out of the sky. They came from the Department of Defense report on allied contributions to the common defense in the April 1988 report to the Congress of the United States.

How can we justify such an outrageous subsidy? Their standard of living is higher than ours. Their health care is free. Their education is free. Free day care is provided at Government expense. They do not have homeless people sleeping in the streets. They spend their taxes taking care of themselves. We spend our taxes taking care of them, defending them. Our defense dollars have created the stable and secure environment which has helped the European economy to prosper.

While we have been building tanks and guns and airplanes to defend them, they have been building cars, stereos, and appliances to sell to American consumers. Our 325,000 American GI's stationed in Europe spend their paychecks there. We support their local economies.

In 1988, we had a combined trade deficit with our Western European trading partners that exceeded $12.5 billion, a deficit and outflow of $12.5 billion from this country to Europe. And over the period from 1984 to 1988 that trade deficit totaled $102.6 billion. That is incredible. That is incredible.

Yet there will be opposition here on the floor of the Senate today to our calling upon the Europeans to pay their fair share of the burden.

It is not even a fair share that I am providing in this amendment. It is but a token. It is a step in the right direction. It is incredible. The fact is we have lost sight of our own national interest. We are defending them when it is we who are suffering.

I have no quarrel about the fact that we defended them and picked up the tab after the war but that war was concluded over 40 years ago and we are still picking up the tab for the Europeans. While our economic security is being weakened, we are being taken for a ride.

The combined economies of our Western European allies are larger and stronger than that of the United States. Every day there is a story in the newspaper about some European company or corporate raider buying another American corporation. Last year European companies spent $33 billion buying up American companies. Our newspapers are filled about the fact that the Japanese are buying up America.

But look overseas to Europe and see what kind of buying has been taking place as far as the European sector is concerned. I have here a list of 100 of the biggest deals of European-United States transactions for the year 1988.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire list be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. METZENBAUM. The first one I notice is B.A.T. Industries Plc bought Farmers Group Inc. on December 16, 1988, a deal involving over $5 billion. Maxwell Communications of the United Kingdom bought Macmillan Inc. in a deal involving $2.6 billion. CS First Boston Inc. bought First Boston Inc. of the United States on December 22, 1988 for $1.677 billion. Hanson Plc of the United Kingdom bought Kidde Inc., January 4, 1988, $4.6 billion. BNS of United Kingdom bought Coppers Co. Inc., November 14, 1988 for $1.553 billion.

I will not read further. I will put the entire list of the top 100 in and that comes up to $33 billion.

British investments in the United States now total $102 billion.

The Dutch ranked third in U.S. investment. They own Shell Oil, Norelco, Lever Brothers, and Dutch investments in this country which have a book value of $49 billion.

Those old American brands—Magnavox, Sylvania—they are Dutch. Calvin Klein perfume, Vaseline, Q-Tips, they are all owned by Unilever, a Dutch company.

And how about the hotel market? Hilton. We always think of Hilton as the great American hotel chain. That is owned by Ladbroke Group, a British company.

Holiday Inn. That is being sold to BASS PLC. I think a British company.

And how about food? Del Monte. It was sold to Polly Peck, a British company.

According to the CIA's world fact book for 1988, the combined gross national product of our NATO allies totaled $4.5 trillion. The gross national product of the United States totaled less than that, $4.1 trillion. Yet, we still contribute 65 percent of NATO's budget. As a percentage of gross domestic product, U.S. defense spending is nearly double that of our large NATO allies—6.54 percent against 3.66 percent.

The Congressional Budget Office calculated that this amendment would save a minimum of $9 billion over the next 5 years. Even greater savings would be realized as a result of the weapons procurement cuts associated with the force demobilization.

With that kind of money, we could double our expenditures on AIDS research, fully fund a child care program serving a million children, pay for adult literacy and worker retraining programs to put this country back on the cutting edge of competitiveness. $9 billion would pay for more than half a million units of new housing in this country.

Despite our efforts to persuade our allies to accept a greater share of the burden, despite our initiatives, I am frank to say that we are making no progress.

I am not the only one who thinks so. My friend, the very well-respected chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee 2 months ago stated here on the Senate floor—and I am now quoting Chairman SAM NUNN:

> Despite our initiatives, no significant progress is in sight on the burden-sharing front.

Furthermore, he said,

> If our allies in NATO are not serious about conventional defense, then we do not need 325,000 American servicemen and servicewomen deployed there. If all our armed forces in Europe are going to do is provide a tripwire for a NATO nuclear response, then we can make do with substantially lower U.S. troop levels.

Then he further said:

> Although our allies have talked a good deal about increasing their burden-sharing effort, very little concrete progress has been made in reducing the U.S. defense share.

He further stated:

> Adjustments in burden-sharing are long overdue.

Mr. President, those are not my words. Those are not the words of some editorial writer. Those are not the words of just any Senator. Those are the words of one of the most respected Members of this body, our distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Chairman SAM NUNN.

Mr. President, may we have order in the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. METZENBAUM. This is 1989, 22 years after Senator Mike Mansfield stated from that chair over there and offered his first NATO troop cut resolution. Twenty-two years ago, Mike Mansfield, as the leader of the Senate, attempted to cut our troops in Europe—16 years after the mutual balance force reduction talks began; 15 years after the first Jackson-Nunn troop cut amendment was offered; 5 years after the Nunn-Roth amendment proposed a permanent ceiling on U.S. troops in Europe as a means of encouraging a greater European commitment to NATO. And after all of these, offered by the leaders of the Senate, we still have no significant progress in sight.

Eighteen years ago, Senator Mansfield stood on the Senate floor and said:

> Few in this body will forget the general alarm that was sounded across this nation and around the globe last May by those who opposed (my) original effort to reduce troops in Europe. * * * It was irresponsible, so they said, for America to withdraw unilaterally half its troops from Western Europe. * * * It has been 6 long months. It is now late November and the cost burden of Europe's defense has not been reduced by a single cent. No such plan has emerged.

Those were the words of Senator Mike Mansfield 18 years ago, talking about 6 long months 18 years ago.

We still have no plan. The State Department says we are close to a conventional arms agreement. They said that 18 years ago. We could put it to music; they have been saying it for 22 years.

Listen to the words of Senator Mansfield again:

> As for mutual balanced force reductions we negotiate and we talk and we thrash over these problems. We do not decide. We do not act. I wait now for it to be revealed right here on this floor today that indeed, once again that we are on the brink of a decision that will accomplish mutual balanced force reductions. * * *

End of the quote of the Senator Mike Mansfield, leader of the Senate.

It never happened and Mike Mansfield knew it was not going to happen. The MBFR talks collapsed under their own weight after 16 years of fruitless negotiations that accomplished absolutely nothing.

President Bush, for whom I have great respect, says he is committed to the new conventional forces in Europe talks. He wants a reduction of 30,000 U.S. troops and he wants a treaty by May 1990.

I agree with the President. That is what this Senator wants, too. But we may not get an agreement. If that is the case, then I believe our allies should bear the cost of continuing to maintain those American soldiers in Europe if they want them to stay in Europe.

I am concerned about the fact that both the Germans and the Belgians are currently considering troop cuts of their own, unilateral troop cuts, regardless of what we do.

The chairman of the Armed Services Committee's burden-sharing amendment in the authorizing bill seeks to address that issue. It would direct proportional cuts in U.S. forces if our allies move forward with unilateral cuts. But as I read the amendment of the Senator, the earliest we could remove our troops in response to a cut by our allies is 1992. This is 1989.

But whether or not the committee amendment becomes the law, and I would guess it will, that is not the issue to which I am addressing myself today. I have no problems with the Chairman's amendment. It is a good amendment that seeks to shore up our allies continued commitment to NATO. The issue is: should we bring our troops home? Or, if not, should not the Europeans pay the cost to maintain those 30,000 troops in Europe?

The Europeans are beating us economically. In 1992, when the European Economic Community achieves full integration, we will be facing a trading partner with very substantial resources. The European Economic Community's 12 member nations will meld into a sole market with 125 million people and a combined gross national product of $4.5 trillion.

Yet we still contribute 65 percent of the cost of their defense. It makes no sense. It is time for us to show some resolve.

We have shouldered the burden of Europe for too long. I urge my colleagues to support the amendment.

Mr. President, in order that I may discuss with a colleague of mine—who is on the floor and wishes to offer an amendment, I believe—that amendment, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 889

(Purpose: To limit the use of appropriated funds for maintaining United States military personnel in NATO member countries in Europe)

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM] proposes an amendment numbered 889.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 108, between lines 4 and 5, insert the following:

SEC. 9100. (a) None of the funds appropriated by this Act may be used for the purpose of supporting an end-strength level, as of September 30, 1990, of members of the Armed Forces of the United States assigned to permanent duty ashore in European member nations of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) at any level greater than the number equal to 30,000 less than the end-strength level, as of September 30, 1989, of members of the Armed Forces of the United States assigned to permanent duty ashore in such nations.

(b) It is the sense of Congress that (1) a declaration of war by Congress or a declaration of a national emergency by Congress or the President authorizes the President to obligate and expend funds appropriated by this Act for the purpose of supporting any end-strength level of members of the Armed Forces of the United States assigned to permanent duty ashore in European member nations of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) that is necessary to prosecute the war or to resolve the national emergency, (2) any amount that is obligated subject to full reimbursement of the United States by any European member nation of NATO should not be considered as obligated in violation of subsection (a), and (3) if an agreement is entered into by the United States and its NATO allies and the Soviet Union and its Warsaw Pact allies on the reduction of conventional armed forces in Europe (CFE) by October 1, 1990, subsection (a) shall be null and void.

AMENDMENT NO. 890 TO AMENDMENT NO. 889

(Purpose: To require the transfer of amounts saved as a result of the limitation on the use of appropriated funds for maintaining United States military personnel in NATO member countries in Europe)

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, I have a perfecting amendment to send to the desk on behalf of myself, Senator PELL, Senator ADAMS, and Senator FORD. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 1, line 3, strike out "(a)" and all that follows through the end of the amendment, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(a) None of the funds appropriated by this Act may be used for the purpose of supporting an end-strength level, as of September 30, 1990, of members of the Armed Forces of the United States assigned to permanent duty ashore in European member nations of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) at any level greater than the number equal to 30,000 less than the end-strength level, as of September 30, 1989, of members of the Armed Forces of the United States assigned to permanent duty ashore in such nations.

(2) The Secretary of Defense shall transfer $941,475,000 to the Department of Education. The amount so transferred shall be available as follows:

(A) For programs under chapter 1 of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, $499,307,000.

(5) The amounts transferred pursuant to this subsection shall be merged with the appropriations available under other appropriation Acts for the programs specified in paragraphs (2) and (3) for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1990, and shall be available for the same time period as such appropriations.

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, I ask at this point for unanimous consent that a member of my staff, Dr. Ziegler, be permitted floor privileges during the pendency of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, I commend the Senator from Ohio for his amendment.

My amendment builds on his. But I want to commend the Senator from Ohio for raising what I believe to be one of the central questions of our time, and that question is, Mr. President: Is it not time to tell our allies in Europe that it is time for them to start taking on a more fair share of our common defense burden?

Mr. President, is it not time to work here at home to bring home some of those resources to use in educating our children and reducing our deficit?

Mr. President, I often wonder, when the history of our time is written, what will people think, those who read our history?

I assume they will think us a curious lot, because they will read, Mr. President, that during this decade we have tripled the national debt in this country; we have multiplied the trade deficit fourfold; we have gone from being the largest creditor Nation in the world, more countries owing us more money than any other country in the world, to being the largest debtor Nation with us owing more than any other country in the world.

Mr. President, we have proceeded to pile debt on top of debt. Even as we speak, the deficit is $150 billion this year. While we are unable to pay our own bills, we are off paying the bills of others, some $100 billion for Europe, almost $50 billion for our friends in Japan because we are paying for their defense umbrella, even though we have to borrow the money from them to do it.

Mr. President, this makes no sense. Someone reading this history, the history of our time 40 years from now and 50 years from now, would look back at this period in American history and wonder why America allowed its strength to dribble away. These are the questions they will be asking: Why did America allow its strength to dribble away? Why was America asleep?

Forty years after the last war, we are still paying the bills for our allies, as well as those who were our enemies in the last war.

Mr. President, my colleague from Ohio quoted quite correctly, I think, from the statement of the chairman of the Armed Services Committee. Let me just repeat what the chairman said.

Despite the growing economic wealth of our European and Pacific allies, the United States continues to bear too large a share of the burden for the common defense. Although the combined gross national product of our NATO allies is larger than that of the United States, we spend almost twice as much on defense as those same NATO allies.

I quote from the chairman:

Corrections in this situation are long overdue.

Mr. President, in 1987, the United States devoted over 6 percent of our gross national product for defense; nearly, $1,200 for every man, woman, and child in this country. Our NATO allies, the subject of the amendment before us, spent about 3⅓ percent of their gross national product, less than $400 for every man, woman, and child.

So, Mr. President, in our country we are devoting almost three times what our allies in Europe are devoting on a per-person basis for defense. Japan is even more egregious; there, they are devoting about 1 percent of their gross national product, about $200 for every man, woman, and child.

Mr. President, even our European allies recognize the need for a change. In an editorial in The Economist from June 11, 1987, this quote appears, and this is the lead editorial of The Economist on that date, Mr. President.

Two hundred forty-one million Americans with an income a bit over $4 trillion do not see why 374 million Europeans with nearly $3.5 trillion should need 300,000 American servicemen and about $100 billion a year of the American defense budget to guard them.

Mr. President, I think they have got that question about right. Why is it that we here in this country, with about 240 million people, need to be subsidizing to the tune of $100 billion a year the 320 million people in Europe against 280 million Soviets 40 years after the last war?

Mr. President, the Secretary of the French Parliament's National Defense Committee said last year:

Do you think 320 million Europeans can continue forever to ask 240 million Americans to defend us against 280 million Soviets?

That was not the Senator from North Dakota. That was not the Senator from Ohio. That was the Secretary of the French Parliament's National Defense Committee. He asked a good question. It deserves an answer. And that is what this amendment seeks to do, to provide an answer or the beginning of an answer, at least.

Some will say: No, no, go slow; the President might veto.

Some will argue that what we are trying to do will interfere with the conventional force talks now going on in Vienna.

Mr. President, I did not hear one single Member of this body raise that question when the Soviets announced unilateral cuts of their own. The head of the Soviet Union has indicated they are going to cut their forces by 500,000 men under arms. I did not hear anyone in this body stand up and say: Oh, that threatens the conventional force talks.

What did we hear? What we heard was voice after voice say: Ah, this is a breakthrough. This tells us that perhaps the Soviets are serious. This tells us that perhaps we are on the verge of a breakthrough.

Mr. President, if that was true of the Soviets when they announced cuts of 500,000, 240,000 of them in the European theater, can we in this country not do one-eighth as much? Can we not send a signal back that we, too, are serious?

Mr. President, this amendment does not cut one military person out of Europe if the Europeans are willing to pay for them.

As we have indicated, the statistics indicate clearly that the Europeans have the full capacity to start making these payments themselves.

Mr. President, why should we not propose a reduction in troops one-eighth the size of Gorbachev's in Europe? And a cut that only occurs if the Europeans decide themselves that they are not necessary and that they are not willing to pay for them.

The truth is, Mr. President, reality is rapidly changing, and we are still locked into a policy that is 40 years old and does not fit the reality of today.

Mr. President, United States civilian and military installations employ nearly 500,000 people in Europe. We have one of the biggest economic development projects on the face of the globe, sponsored by the United States taxpayer, going on in Europe. All the time that we are paying their bills, unable to pay our own, we are faced with growing problems here at home. The budget deficit is out of control; we have serious unmet educational needs. Mr. President, I say to my colleagues, I believe that now is the time to start to make the change, for the U.S. leadership to demonstrate to the American public that it understands these new realities.

Major changes are under way in the Soviet Union with perestroika and glasnost. Changes are going on in Poland, Hungary, and all across the globe. The Soviets recognize that their economy is not working and that their internal priorities have to change.

Mr. President, under this amendment, NATO allies have the option. If they consider these 30,000 troops important to their security, they can pay the bill. To those who say we need to give our allies adequate notice, I say we already have. Two years ago I stood on the floor of this Chamber and offered an amendment that required the United States to negotiate with our allies and report back to Congress on our progress. Mr. President, every 6 months the Deputy Secretary of Defense, William Howard Taft, came and reported to me on the results of those negotiations. Mr. President, every 6 months he would come back and he would tell me of the marginal changes that our allies had agreed to, and I mean marginal changes. The fact is, nothing much happened. That was 2 years ago.

Under the measures adopted this summer in the DOD authorization bill, we would be asked to wait another 2 years to see any change. Mr. President, when do we stop waiting? When do we start bringing home just a small fraction of our troops in Europe, 30,000 out of 325,000 and only if the Europeans refuse to pick up the cost so we can start dealing with some of our pressing needs at home. I believe now is the time to start reducing our deficit, to tell the allies to start paying more of a fair share of the cost of our mutual defense and to strengthen our national investment in education.

Mr. President, the amendment that I have sent to the desk is a second-degree amendment that seeks the return of 30,000 United States troops from Europe, unless the NATO countries are willing to pay the cost of keeping them there. My amendment would transfer $1 billion of the savings in budget authority to programs that address serious education problems here at home. The amendment would also reduce the budget deficit because the outlay savings will exceed the education program costs.

Mr. COHEN. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CONRAD. I am not finished, and I will be happy to yield at the time I conclude my statement. I would like to proceed and conclude the full thrust of my statement, and then I will be happy to yield.

This bill yields fiscal 1990 savings of just over $1 billion in budget authority, $630 million in outlays, transfers $1 billion of these budget authority savings to education programs, requiring $180 million in outlays and leaving $450 million for deficit reduction.

The amendment produces long-term savings of approximately $10 billion over the next 5 years. Budget priorities in the 1980's, if you look at them, education has been shortchanged. We now have just concluded, quite close to here, the President of the United States meeting with the Nation's 50 Governors to talk about the problems of the education system in America. The problems are deep, and while Federal spending is just a small part of the support for education in this country, the signal that the Federal Government sends is an important one. Since 1980, Federal spending for education has decreased 4 percent in real terms. Over that same period, real defense spending has risen approximately 47 percent. In fiscal 1980, education represented 2.5 percent of the Federal budget. By fiscal 1989, its share had fallen to 1.8 percent. Mr. President, this amendment, the perfecting amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, transfers those funds, that $1 billion in budget authority, right where they are needed, exactly where the Secretary of Education says they should go.

Last weekend on the McLaughlin show, the Secretary of Education was asked what he would do if the President provided him an additional $2 billion for education. His reply: Chapter 1, Pell grants. That is two things. The two go hand in hand. The Secretary of Education was right. We in this country have serious problems that cry out to be addressed. The dropout rate in this country now approaches 25 percent. A number of weeks ago I was riding in my car and heard on the radio that for the first time in the city of Baltimore the dropout rate exceeds the graduation rate. Several days ago I was in Jacksonville, FL. The man who picked me up at the airport taught in the local schools, and I told him what I had just heard about what was happening in Baltimore. That man said, "You know, precisely the same thing is happening in Jacksonville. The dropout rate is beginning to exceed the graduation rate."

Mr. President, these are serious matters. What does it mean to the strength of a country when 25 percent of the students are not graduating with their class? Oh, I know, some of them go back. I know that is the case. But the fact is 25 percent are not graduating with their classes.

What happens, Mr. President, when they test our children against the students of the countries with whom we compete? What happens? We just had that kind of test. Seventeen countries. They were tested on math and science.

Do you know where our students came out? American 17-year olds, dead last in biology; American 17-year-olds, dead last in mathematics; American 17-year-olds, second to last in chemistry.

Mr. President, what is it going to take for America to decide it is time to act? What is it going to take? One in five American workers can read at only the eighth grade level, 50 percent of high school seniors lack the reading ability necessary to perform moderately complex tasks, and 80 percent have inadequate writing skills.

In a 1988 Gallup poll of 16 countries, respondents were asked 16 questions. American 18- to 24-year-olds scored below their counterparts in all other countries including Mexico. Fewer than half could guess that the population of this country is in the range of 150 to 300 million people. More respondents in Sweden, Japan, and Canada knew the size of the United States population than Americans.

According to the testimony of former Education Secretary William Bennett, in a 1984 test more than 20 percent of 12-year-olds could not locate the United States on a world map. Twenty percent of our 12-year-olds could not point out America on a world map. In a 1986 survey of college students, 25 percent could not find the Soviet Union on a map. We can do better than that.

Mr. President and my colleagues, we must do better than that. That is why we should put more resources into chapter 1. Evaluations show this program improves elementary student reading and math ability, increases of 4 to 7 percent in reading and 5 to 7 percent in math.

Five hundred million dollars under my amendment would go to chapter 1. Six hundred thousand more children in this country would become eligible and receive compensatory education under this program if this additional funding were provided—again, Mr. President, right where the Secretary of Education says it ought to go.

Other countries are surpassing us in their ability to educate their work forces. They are recognizing the jobs will be requiring people with good educational and technical skills, not people barely able to read and write and count.

The United States must also broaden access to higher education. That is why additional resources for the Pell Grant Program are so important. The number of very low income students eligible for Federal aid has rapidly increased from 1980 to 1985. Recipients from the poorest families who cannot contribute anything toward the cost of a college education rose by nearly 500,000 in this country. During this period the maximum award from Pell grants has gone from covering 50 percent of college expenses to under 30 percent. The Pell Grant Program is experiencing in this fiscal year a shortfall of $331 million, which my amendment would restore.

Mr. President, altogether 80 percent of the funds transferred by the amendment would go to chapter 1 and Pell grants. Additional amounts are also provided for Head Start—some $60 million. With that $60 million we would increase the number who could be served by 15,000 to 17,000 additional children. We would provide $40 million for handicapped education. We would provide $30 million for vocational education.

I would point out to my colleagues that there has been a 31-percent loss in the purchasing power of Federal vocational education dollars over the last decade. We would provide $20 million for adult education, $8 million for the THEO programs, $6 million for small rural schools and $5 million for family school partnerships.

Mr. President, the question before us as a society and before us as a Congress is how do we use the precious resources that are available to us? That is what this amendment addresses. This amendment simply says it is time to say to our allies in Europe it is your turn now. Either you pick up the tab for these troops, you start to take on a more fair share of our common defense burden or they are coming home, they are coming home so that we can finance the rebuilding of this country that is so critical to our future. No place is more important than the educational foundation of our children.

Mr. President, for 2 days the President of the United States and the 50 Governors have concentrated on the problems of our educational system, the deterioration in quality that is occurring. We have an opportunity to act tonight to do something meaningful. I hope we do not lose that opportunity.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. COHEN. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. INOUYE. I will be very happy to yield.

Mr. COHEN. I pose a question to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee. As I read this amendment, none of the funds appropriated under this act may be used for the purposes of supporting an end strength level of September 30, 1990. I do not see anything in this particular amendment, either the underlying amendment or the perfecting amendment, that says these troops will be inactivated. Does the Senator from Hawaii have a different understanding?

Mr. INOUYE. I would assume that these troops would be shipped back to the United States together with their dependents.

Mr. COHEN. And left on active duty.

Mr. INOUYE. And left on active duty. If that is the case, it would mean at least an additional cost of $120 million to transport wives and children and the soldiers back to the United States. Then you add to this housing. Assuming that the best we can provide for our troops would be barracks, it will still cost in excess of $50 million to provide this barracks housing. Then the other matter such as hospitals, clinics, other personnel to support this, and all this to be done in 4 days unless the intention is to discharge the troops in Europe and just leave them there with their wives and children and tell them you find your way back at your own cost.

Mr. COHEN. So as I understand what the chairman is saying, this is to fire 30,000 troops and leave them in Europe or else, inccur an additional $120 million in responsibility in the next 4 days?

Mr. INOUYE. I would estimate it would cost at least a quarter of a billion dollars.

Mr. COHEN. If the the chairman will yield further, there are two things that trouble me about the amendment. No. 1, it is held out saying that we are going to save $1 billion by this amendment, which in fact it will not do unless we are talking about inactivation of the troops. No. 2, it suggests that that $1 billion is all going to be achieved in 1 year. According to what I have heard on the Senate floor this evening, it is going to take at least over a 5-year period of time in order to achieve the so-called reductions in spending.

Yet, according to this amendment they take it all out in 1 year. Assuming the figures were even accurate which they are not they take $1 billion out in a very first year of savings that do not exist. So it seems to me it fails on two accounts. No. 1, it does not accurately reflect the situation that the troops would be deactivated, or inactivated is the proper term, and, No. 2, it assumes a billion-dollar savings in 1 year because this amendment would transfer $1 billion out and to the educational budget in a 1-year period of time. Is that not the case?

Mr. INOUYE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator from Maine yield for a question?

Mr. COHEN. I do not have the floor.

Mr. INOUYE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, the debate we are engaged in at this moment is a very important one. I regret very much that there are only five of us here because it affects the defense of the United States. Much has been said this afternoon about we defending Europeans, that we are sending our men and women overseas to defend Germans, French, Italians, and British. Mr. President, we are in Europe to defend ourselves. We are not in Europe because we want to defend the Swedes and the Norwegians. We are in there because of our national welfare and our national interest. Imagine if we decided that at the end of World War II to say to ourselves we won the war, now let us all go home. Let the Europeans who have been devastated fend for themselves. Imagine how long after that we would have had a Sovietized Europe. Imagine if we had followed our beloved leader, Mike Mansfield, and began withdrawing our forces 15 years ago at a time of Krushchev and Brezhnev. You did not have a Gorbachev at that time. They had no intentions to reduce their forces.

We are there to make certain that the Europeans remain strong to check the Warsaw Pact nations and to keep the Soviets in check.

Speaking of costs, I believe most every Member in debating this issue would suggest that we are spending approximately $30 billion in Europe. That is $120 per citizen in the United States. That is 10 percent of what we are considering at this moment. It is not $1,200 as suggested by some. Keep in mind that the cost the Europeans are bearing for the defense of their nations are all in Europe.

I do not suppose that the troops that we have deployed in the Philippines are part of the European defense or troops in Okinawa are for the European defense. Our taxpayers pay heavily, yes; $120 per person. But as I said, we are there to defend ourselves.

In the past several months we have experienced much euphoria in the United States. The statements of Mikhail Gorbachev have excited all of us. He has made stunning announcements of reducing Warsaw Pact troops and Soviet troops by large numbers. But, Mr. President, as of this moment, Warsaw Pact nations have 52,000 tanks. We have, that is NATO, 22,000. Warsaw Pact nations at this moment have in place, ready to fire, 43,400 artillery pieces. On the other side of the border, NATO, that is including the United States, has 17,300 artillery pieces; 17,000 against 43,000, 52,000 against 22,000 tanks.

Warsaw Pact has 55,100 armored troop carriers. They are very mobile. We have 28,000. This is after Gorbachev's reductions.

That is why the President of the United States is presently together with our allies in NATO engaged in negotiations on a conventional force reduction in Europe. That is on our President's agenda. If he were to unilaterally, as proposed by this amendment, cut our troops we would be undercutting the President of the United States and our allies in the midst of this negotiation. Yes, the President has indicated that he would be willing to reduce U.S. soldiers and sailors in Europe by 30,000 but under a negotiated and verifiable agreement between NATO and the Warsaw Pact. That is a big difference. If we are to reduce our forces by 30,000, then they should reduce their tanks by more than what they have now.

So, Mr. President, the issue before us is not that simple. As my dear friend from Maine has pointed out, much as I applaud Senator CONRAD for his desire to add to our educational funds, my amendment together with that of the amendment of my dear friend from Ohio will not bring about any savings. It costs $4,000 per service person now and dependents to be just shipped back to the United States—

$4,000 times 30,000 troops: $120 million. That is landed in New York. What do we do after that? We need transportation to take them somewhere. We need housing. We need hospitals. We need doctors, nurses. It is not that simple and conservatively we figure that if this amendment were to pass and become law instead of saving money we would be adding for this fiscal year an additional half a billion dollars. Furthermore, we would be undercutting, cutting our President at his ankles.

Mr. President, the President of the United States is of another political party. But he is my President and he is the President of the United States. And he is in charge of our negotiations. As long as I can stand here as chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, I will fight any attempt made by any Member of this body to undercut his efforts to negotiate a troop reduction in Europe.

This is not the way to do it. And so I hope that my colleagues will, by resounding vote, reject the Metzenbaum and the Conrad amendments.

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, there has been some discussion as to how much this would save and how much more it would cost. I am not sure what the authority of my good friend from Maine is or of my good friend from Hawaii is as to the cost, but I can say that when the President made the proposal about bringing home 30,000 troops, the chairman and ranking member of the Budget Committee asked the Congressional Budget Office to make a determination as to what economic impact that would have.

I should point out that they assume that which the President had apparently indicated he expected to be the case, and they say in their response, these forces—the President called for a ceiling on United States and Soviet ground and air force personnel stationed outside of national territory in the Atlantic to the Eurozone at approximately 275,000. These forces are to be demobilized.

Furthermore, the President stated that the U.S. withdrawal would be designed to reduce U.S. combat manpower in Europe by 20 percent.

Now, what about the savings? Reduction in U.S. forces could include demobilizing 30,000 troops now stationed in Europe, as well as destroying some U.S. tanks, armored personnel carriers, artillery, helicopters and land-based combat aircraft. I am reading from the Congressional Budget Office.

If not offset by other policy changes, the President's proposal would reduce future U.S. defense budgets. Under one of many plausible assumptions about how the President's proposal would be carried out, the reduction in personnel and operating costs would amount to about $2 billion a year, and extended, that would mean $2 billion for each of the 5 years.

But the fact is that they put a note on it. There is an offset against the first year.

They put a note on which reads as follows: If the entire reduction, all 30,000 people, were implemented in fiscal year 1990, savings in that year would be approximately half this amount or $1 billion; this assumes that the reductions could be attained through normal rotation and attrition, which might be difficult, if the entire reduction took place in a single year.

In subsequent years, annual savings would be about $2 billion annually, plus inflation. To me that means when you bring back the 30,000 troops and demobilize them, as the President of the United States anticipates doing, we would be saving $9 billion.

It further means that the $1 billion, to which my colleague from North Dakota has been addressing himself, it means that that billion dollars is available for the educational purposes about which he has been speaking.

Mr. CONRAD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine, for whom I have enormous respect, raises the question of the savings numbers that was raised by the chairman of the subcommittee as well.

We have not come out here and just taken numbers out of the air. We have official CBO estimates, which the Senator from Ohio has referred to, and we think those are very clear. They take into account moving the troops back home. They do assume that end strength is reduced. They make that assumption, and we make that assumption. But I do not think anyone should leave here with the notion that somehow these numbers that we have cited are not correct. They are the official numbers of the Congressional Budget Office.

No. 2, the chairman of the subcommittee said our troops are in Europe for our defense. I would amend that with one additional word—our "common" defense. That is the question that is before us, Mr. President.

We are part of an alliance, we are part of an alliance and should there not be an equitable sharing of the burden of maintaining that alliance? That is one of the questions before us here to day. There clearly is not an equitable sharing of the burden. The chairman of the Armed Services Committee has said that himself.

When we, 2 years ago, asked the administration—required the administration to negotiate with our allies to see if there was an equitable sharing of the burden, the administration came back and said there was not an equitable sharing. When do we ask our allies to take on a fair share of this burden?

All we hear is wait. We have waited 2 years since this Senate overwhelmingly passed a measure asking our administration to negotiate with our allies. Now we are being asked to wait again. Wait, wait, wait. It has been 40 years, Mr. President, and the taxpayers of this country deserve us to act now.

The chairman of the subcommittee raises the question of unilateral action. I addressed that earlier. I will simply say that the Soviets took unilateral action; 240,000 troops they are pulling out of the European Theater—500,000 troops in an overall cut. They have made a decision that unilateral action does not preclude or prevent conventional force reduction talks. In fact, it enhances those talks, because it builds trust.

Worldwide study several years ago concluded that the big winner in the conflict between the Soviet Union and the United States are our European economic competitors and the Japanese economic competitor, and what could be more clear.

It was announced that the Japanese assets worldwide now exceed the value of United States assets worldwide for the first time. The standard of living in Germany, a study recently released, indicated for the first time surpasses our own.

Mr. President, I refer to the questions and problems in education. If we look at the challenges facing this country, deficits, the withering of the educational system, this amendment addresses those questions.

This amendment says it is time to tell the allies it is time for them to take on a more fair share of this burden. This amendment says it is time to address the deficit problem that weakens this country. We want to talk about threats to the security of this Nation. I believe the overwhelming evidence is that our economic vulnerability is a key threat to our national security. This amendment addresses that vulnerability.

Mr. President, finally, instead of undercutting the President, I believe this strengthens the President because I believe it sends a signal to the Soviets that we, too, are serious. Two hundred and forty thousand Soviet troops were cut from the European theater unilaterally. Cannot we do one-eighth as much?

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senate will suspend, is the Senator from Ohio asking for the yeas and nays on the amendment in the first degree or in the second degree.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I am asking for the yeas and nays on the Conrad amendment to the amendment in the second degree.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays are ordered to the amendment in the second degree. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Is there further debate?

The Senator from Maine.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I will take 2 minutes to make a point made already.

First, I commend the Senator from Hawaii. As one who fought and fought valiantly, heroically, and courageously during World War II, I think he has as great appreciation of the national security interests of the United States as any person who walked on the floor of the Senate. I have enormous respect and admiration for him.

Second, it seems to me that this particular amendment, as he pointed out, does not do what it purports to do. While the rhetoric is such it is going to save us money, the reality is there is nothing in the amendment, underlying amendment or the perfecting amendment which calls for the inactivation or the demobilization of the forces and, therefore, although the rhetoric is we are going to cut 30,000 troops, the amendment does not say that.

The projection is you are going to save $1 billion in the first year. That is a matter of great dispute assuming you are going to even cut the forces which this is not going to do.

The third point I make is we are witnessing vast change as the authors of these amendments have suggested. A hurricane wind passed through the United States recently. We are still recovering from it. There is a hurricane wind that is blowing through a good part of the world today and in the midst of a hurricane wind the last thing we want to have is either an impetuous hand or petulant hand. What we want is a steady hand.

It seems to me what the President of the United States is doing is he is agreeing to reduce the size of our force structure in Europe and perhaps even elsewhere provided we do it systematically, provided we do it in a balanced, responsible, rational fashion and one in which we can actually verify the results, all of which are missing in this particular amendment.

So I urge my colleagues to vote against the amendment, well intentioned as it might be, noble as it would be, and I would support efforts to enhance our educational endeavors, but not through a process which holds out really an illusory $1 billion to transfer to the education budget. It will not produce it. Indeed, it will only impose additional cost. So I urge the defeat of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I join in support of the thoughts voiced by the senior Senator from Hawaii and the distinguished Senator from Maine in connection with this amendment.

It is curious that just today those of us on the arms control observer group are making preparation for what we believe and hope if the recess does occur in the first part of October to go to Europe, not only to Geneva to see those talks but also to Vienna where the talks on the conventional forces in Europe are taking place. Those are talks I am greatly interested in because what they deal with, as the name says, it is a reduction in the conventional forces, and it is odd that we should be undertaking on the floor of the Senate now unilaterally on behalf of the United States to reduce our forces in Europe, part of our NATO forces, when our negotiators in Vienna at this very time are working with the Soviets on a reduction which can be worked out, balanced reductions, reductions on the part of the Soviets and reductions on the part of the United States.

So it seems to me there could be no more inappropriate time for us to plunge in on the floor of the Senate with this cut of 30,000 members of our Armed Forces in Europe at this particular time. These are things which should be negotiated and are being negotiated.

So I think the points the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Hawaii make are absolutely right on target there. And also, of course, all of us are for spending more money on education but, as has been so well pointed out, this is illusory; it is not there.

First of all we have to bring the forces back if indeed that is to take place, and I think that has been pretty well documented just the savings are not there.

So I hope we will all join in supporting the position of the Senator from Hawaii on this particular matter.

Mr. President, this amendment troubles me because it is misleading. The Senator from North Dakota would have us believe that $1 billion in outlays will be available for education if we call 30,000 American troops home from Europe.

These savings are based on a CBO estimate of President Bush's proposal to demobilize those 30,000 troops. And yet, this amendment says nothing about deactivating those troops—it merely brings them home. As the senior Senator from Hawaii has pointed out, the amendment would not make available additional funds to help us meet pressing national education goals, but instead would cost money, perhaps as much as a quarter of a billion dollars in the next fiscal year.

If money were truly being made available to chapter 1, Pell grants, adult literacy, education of the handicapped, and the other worthy programs enumerated in the amendment, then this would be an different and important debate.

Unfortunately, no such funds exist here. Instead, one of our most precious values is being used as a smokescreen for an opportunity to bash our NATO Allies and undermine ongoing negotiations that promise real troop reductions and real savings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, I might just briefly respond by reading from an interview with the Secretary of Defense on Sunday on "This Week With David Brinkley." He said:

> There is evidence that in fact Mr. Gorbachev is following through on his announced unilateral move to reduce troops in Eastern Europe, take out tanks, and so forth. There is evidence that the production rates of certain conventional systems such as tanks are in fact declining.

Those are the words of the Secretary of Defense of the United States, Secretary Cheney, on "This Week With David Brinkley."

That was a unilateral move to cut the Soviet forces by 240,000 in the European theater.

This amendment does not cut one soldier unless the Europeans are unwilling to pay a more fair share of this common defense burden. Not one soldier leaves if they are willing to pick up the tab.

The question is who ought to pay? Why should the American taxpayer continue to be sent the bill? Why should they be asked to pick up the tab when they are already paying $1,200 for every man, woman, and child in the United States and our European friends who have an economy as large as ours now are paying one-third as much? It is not fair.

If we go and see what is happening in Europe and see how their children are doing in competition with our children, what can be more clear than that we need to direct more resources into our educational system and insist that our allies start picking up more of this common defense burden?

Mr. President, in terms of whether or not the savings are there at this point, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the official estimate of the Congressional Budget Office which says the savings are there, the savings are there. These are not illusory savings. The cost of sending the troops back home has already been calculated. That is in the numbers. These are the official savings calculated by the Congressional Budget Office.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I regret I have not been here to hear the debate but I would like to just speak briefly on this. I was tied up in two other meetings.

I think it is important that we recognize we have some major problems. We just had an educational summit climax today. The President stressed how important doing better in education is for the future of this country.

No one can doubt that. I am a political realist. I recognize what the probability is on this amendment. But I also recognize the validity of the basic thrust of this amendment.

We are talking about, for example, our No. 1 economic competitor is Japan. Japan has a 2-percent dropout rate. The United States has a 28-percent dropout rate. You look at the dropout rates in urban America, I do not care whether it is Cleveland, I say to Senator METZENBAUM, or Atlanta, I say to Senator FOWLER, or Chicago, or you name the urban area and you will see very high dropout rates, particularly among minorities, astronomical in some cases. In some cases the majority of Hispanic and black young people are not graduating from high school. And then you look at the statistics: 18 percent of the work force today is composed of minorities. By the end of the century, not very far off, it is going to be 29 percent.

What kind of a future are we building for this country? I think we have to do better.

The answer is not all for the Federal Government. Much of the answer is frankly raising standards for teachers and raising pay for teachers. In Japan, teachers are paid approximately the same as lawyers, doctors, and engineers. They are in the top 10 percent in terms of income. I do not need to tell you what the situation is in the United States.

In Japan, teachers go in and they make a career out of teaching. The average teacher in the United States teaches for 6½ years, then goes into another field.

We have to do better. We are going to have to get serious about education. When you graduate from secondary school in the Soviet Union, you have 4 years of physics. Sixteen percent of those who graduate from high school in the United States have 1 year of physics.

One of the most startling statistics that I know is that we have more school districts in the United States than we have physics teachers in the United States. It is incredible. Are we going to be competitive? We have the only Foreign Service in the world you can get into without the knowledge of a foreign language. When I talk to George Shultz and Jim Baker about this, they say, "You can't expect us to do what our educational system has not done."

In our educational system, we are the only country on the face of the Earth where you go through grade school, high school, college, get a Ph.D, and never have a year of foreign language. We wonder why we have a trade deficit. It is a very simple rule in business. I see my friend, Senator LAUTENBERG, walking on the floor, who is a leader in the field of business. There is an old rule in business. You can buy in any language. If you want to sell, you have to speak the language of your customer. Very, very simple. We are not speaking the languages of our customers, and so we are losing out.

And Senator CONRAD's remarks about asking our friends in Western Europe, particularly, and Japan, to bear more of the burden, I think that that just makes sense. We are spending, we, the American people, are spending three times as much per capita for the defense of Western Europe as our friends in Western Europe are spending. That made sense in 1950, maybe in 1960. It does not makes sense in 1989.

Again, my friends, I recognize what is going to happen to this amendment. But I hope the signal will go forward that we have to do more than just have public relations kinds of gimmicky meetings, educational summits that are really not educational summits.

If we really want to have an educational summit that is meaningful, the President of the United States ought to get together with leaders of Congress of both political parties who want to do something about education. Here we can do something. But we avoid doing that. I hope we will at least give a strong indication in a vote on this amendment that we are concerned about the educational future of this country.

We are going to have to raise standards. We are going to have to do better. This amendment is not going to do it by itself, but it is a small step on a journey that we have to take.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, I would like to introduce into the RECORD a letter from the Committee for Education Funding. The Committee for Education Funding is a coalition of some 100 organizations. Let me just read the first two paragraphs.

During Senate consideration of the FY 1990 Defense Appropriations Bill, the Committee For Education Funding [CEF], a coalition of 100 education organizations, urges you to vote for a Conrad amendment that would transfer $1 billion from the Department of Defense to education.

If this nation is to regain its stature as an internationally competitive economy, provide the personnel for a strong defense, and lay the foundation for future economic growth and prosperity, we must make the education of our young people a clear priority. The Conrad amendment is fiscally responsible and urgently needed to restore lost value to our key education programs.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMITTEE FOR EDUCATION FUNDING,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR: During Senate consideration of the FY 1990 Defense Appropriations Bill, the Committee for Education Funding (CEF), a coalition of 100 education organizations, urges you to vote for a Conrad amendment that would transfer $1 billion from the Department of Defense to education.

If this nation is to regain its stature as an internationally competitive economy, provide the personnel for a strong defense, and lay the foundation for future economic growth and prosperity, we must make the education of our young people a clear priority. The Conrad amendment is fiscally responsible and urgently needed to restore lost value to our key education programs.

The amendment would increase funding for vital education programs such as Chapter 1, Pell Grants, Education of the Handicapped, Family-School Partnerships, Head Start, Vocational and Adult Education, Adult Literacy, TRIO programs, and Rural Small Schools. To continue to deny eligible children access to proven federal education programs is an act of national negligence that accepts increased dropout rates and lives spent in a fruitless search for jobs at the margins of an economy.

The Committee for Education Funding member organizations urge you to vote for the Conrad education amendment that will be offered to the Defense Appropriations Bill.

Sincerely,

Committee for Education Funding, Executive Committee: Gerald Morris, CEF President, American Federation of Teachers; Nicholas J. Penning, CEF Treasurer, American Association of School Administrators; Edward R. Elmendorf, American Association of State Colleges and Universities; Carol C. Henderson, American Library Association; Edward R. Kealy, National School Boards Association; Julianne Still Thrift, National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities; Brenda Welburn, National Association of State Boards of Education; Patricia M. Hawkins, National Association of College Admission Counselors; Becky H. Timmons, CEF Vice President, American Council on Education; Clyde C. Aveilhe, California State University; Carnie C. Hayes, Council of Chief State School Officers; Moses D. Holmes, National Education Association; Richard A. Kruse, National Association of Secondary School Principals; Robin Vink, New York State Education Department; Nan S. Wells, Princeton University; Richard Yep, American Association for Counseling and Development.

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, I would also like to repeat the argument one more time. We in this country have a deficit that is out of control. We have an education system that needs to be strengthened. And we are paying the bills for our allies when we are unable to pay our own.

Some of us believe that the key vulnerability of our country is the vulnerability created by an economy that is not strong. This is an attempt to move in a new direction.

Mr. President, I would just close by quoting President Johnson in a special message to Congress on January 12, 1965, 24 years ago. He said:

Every child must be encouraged to get as much education as he has the ability to take. We want this not only for his sake, but for the Nation's sake. Nothing matters more to the future of our country—not military preparedness, for armed might is worthless if we lack the brainpower to build a world of peace; not our productive economy, for we cannot sustain growth without trained manpower; not our democratic system of Government, for freedom is fragile if citizens are ignorant.

Mr. President, I believe this amendment speaks to the highest ideals of this country. I urge my colleagues to support it.

I yield the floor.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, this debate has been a very exciting one for me and for many of us here. We have spent much time on this, nearly an hour and a half. I would like to suggest that everything that should be said has just about been said.

So, I ask unanimous consent that a vote be held no later than 6:40 this evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Is there further debate on the amendment? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. CONRAD].

The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I rise to indicate my support for the intent of the Conrad amendment, and my opposition to the underlying Metzenbaum amendment.

There are few congressional initiatives with as much merit as deficit reduction and educational excellence. The effort to place more funds into crucial education programs is obviously worthy. Our American education system has not been able to keep up with the needs of increasing numbers of at risk children, nor with the competition of an international marketplace. Unfortunately, as the Senator from North Dakota has eloquently delineated, the Federal commitment to education has diminished in recent years.

Certainly, with the President's and Governors' education summit in Charlottesville, such a commitment from Congress would be most timely. I commend the Senator from North Dakota for utilizing the offset from Senator METZENBAUM's amendment in this manner.

Indeed, the education programs targeted by Senator CONRAD are entirely consistent with my view of the Federal role in education. That is, that the Federal Government should assist States and local school districts with educating the handicapped and less fortunate. Pell Grants, Adult Literacy, Head Start, Trio, and Rural Small Schools are all programs which I endorse and support.

It would be a worthy amendment to dedicate more funds to these programs.

It is my understanding, however, that the Conrad amendment, while drafted as a perfecting amendment, also contains the substance of the Metzenbaum amendment. I am therefore unable to support the amendment.

Mr. President, I certainly agree that our NATO allies, as well as other allies around the world, need to increase their support for American troops stationed abroad. I have voted for greater allied burden sharing in the past. However, as we are all well aware, President Bush is currently in the midst of negotiations between NATO and the Warsaw Pact to reduce conventional arms in Europe.

Mr. President, any forced cut as sizable as 30,000 troops should only take place within the context of these negotiations, and not as a result of some unilateral action by Congress. Therefore, I do not support this amendment. I do, however, urge President Bush to continue working toward a mutual agreement that will lead to sizable multilateral conventional force reductions.

I also urge the President to press hard toward increasing the burden share of our allies, and therefore reducing the lopsided burden of the American taxpayer in maintaining these troops on foreign shores.

Mr. President, I regret having to oppose this amendment. I want it to be understood, however, that I would have supported the Conrad amendment had it not also contained the language of the Metzenbaum amendment.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. BURNS] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

So the amendment (No. 890) to amendment 889 was rejected.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I support the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. In fact, this is a matter I brought up during the debate on the Treaty on Intermediate Nuclear Weapons, the INF Treaty.

I said that the INF Treaty would inevitably weaken NATO. I said that the Soviets would cheat on the treaty, and were cheating on the treaty, because they had already concealed far greater numbers of the weapons to be eliminated than they had declared.

I pointed out that the treaty would not destroy any nuclear weapons, but only the obsolete launchers, leaving the Soviets the option to use the weapons on more modern launchers.

Moreover, I said that the treaty was not verifiable because our national technical means was inadequate.

And, contrary to prevailing wisdom in the United States, I stated that our Pershing missiles were strategic weapons from the Soviet point of view, not tactical weapons. Their elimination would leave the defense of Europe dependent upon the United States willingness to launch a nuclear holocaust if the Soviets marched in. Since most observers, including the Soviets, think that is improbable, the result means that Europe is for all practical purposes strategically defenseless.

For this reason, I proposed an amendment to the treaty which would require the withdrawal of all 300,000 U.S. forces as the missiles were destroyed. Of course, that was just a rhetorical exercise, but my point was to emphasize that the INF treaty would leave NATO in a shambles and we might as well take our troops home.

Unfortunately, too many of the events taking place today read like my predictions during the treaty debate. My fears that the Soviets had a stockpile of concealed missiles seems to be borne out by recent press reports. Credible newspaper stories report that the Soviets have more ground-launched cruise missiles than they declared or destroyed. Other press reports state that the DIA has now almost doubled its estimate of the Soviet SS-20 stockpile from 1,200—the official number claimed during the treaty debate—to 2,200, the number I claimed during the debate.

Today we hear much about on-site inspection. But we hear little about the fact that the main technical inspection device, the Cargo-Scan x-ray machine, has just been shipped from the United States to the SS-20 factory at Votkinsk. Who knows how long it will be before it is operational? It is a year late now. Without the x ray, we have no idea what is coming out of the factory in those big metal containers.

Moreover, the President's report to the Senate last December confirmed that the Soviets had committed five violations of the INF Treaty in the first year. The violations were corrected under pressure from the United States, but they could occur again. The President's report confirms the Soviet willingness to violate when it suits their purposes.

Finally, the strategic posture of NATO is a sham, and the allies are in confusion. It is freely admitted that NATO ground forces could withstand Warsaw Pact forces for about 2 days. The deterrence provided by the Pershing missiles has been removed. The West Germans and other NATO members are reluctant to modernize the short-range Lance missiles. And I can certainly sympathize with their reluctance. With a range of only 80 miles, the Lance missiles would most likely be exploded on German territory, not Soviet territory. If the INF Treaty had never been signed, Germany would still have had strategic protection deterring invasion and moving the battlefield to Soviet territory.

Mr. President, that is why the United States is moving toward the position I advocated in the INF Treaty debate, that is to say, bring the American troops home. They literally have no function anymore. NATO has become a ceremonial ritual, a meaningless gesture of friendship that consumes half of our defense budget. We are engaged in talks for the mutual reduction of ground forces in Europe with the Soviet Union, which calls for a phased withdrawal of about 10 percent. But I suspect that other events will overtake us, and U.S. troops will be brought home sooner than any of us really think.

I should emphasize that I do not favor diminishing our relations with Europe. What I am saying is that we are just playing out the decisions inherent in the INF Treaty which I opposed.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I support the goal of the Metzenbaum amendment. We should begin to bring some of our overseas troops home. But, we must do it right—to help accomplish the removal of Soviet troops where possible.

The economic realities of today dictate that the United States act to shift the defense burden that we bear relative to our NATO Allies. We can no longer afford to pay more for the defense of Europe than the Europeans do. For example, while the United States pays $1,164 per American citizen on defense, Britain pays only $481 per capita and West Germany only $454 per person. So, there can be no question that our defense burdensharing must become more equitable.

But, at present, we are currently faced with an opportunity to reduce the number of our forces abroad while also reducing the number of forces aligned against NATO. In the CFE negotiations the President has proposed to remove 30,000 United States troops from Europe and if his proposal is agreed to the Soviet Union would have to remove 350,000 troops from the territory of Eastern Europe.

The CFE talks show promise of making early and significant progress. We should recognize that we may have an opportunity at hand to trade relatively small numbers of United States troops for disproportionately large Soviet reductions. The removal of Soviet troops from Eastern Europe will reduce the threat of surprise conventional attack against NATO and thereby increase our security. We should allow the CFE negotiations to proceed toward this goal.

Then we could see our way to substantial cuts saving a large percentage of our defense expenditures in Europe.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, the amendment by the distinguished Senator from Ohio contains a kernel of sentiment with which most of us would agree.

The self-admitted bankruptcy of the Communist system, the success of market-oriented democracies, and consequent realignment of economic strength among us, are cause for a fundamental appraisal of old policies, new dangers, and new opportunities.

Certainly, we face severe constraints on our own resources, particularly due to our own towering deficits in the Federal budget and in our balance of trade.

Most of us agree that the European allies must bear a greater share of the burden for the common defense of the West. We must reduce the U.S. portion of NATO's defense effort. Our finances, our trade situation, make this change inevitable.

Unfortunately, the amendment seeks to advance this desirable objective through means that are ill-advised, and which would merely undermine the negotiations now underway to reduce both the NATO and Warsaw Pact conventional forces. It seeks to force the European allies to increase their support payments through ultimatum, at a time when NATO is slogging through the tough talks with the Soviets to reduce the conventional military confrontation in Europe.

Many attempts have been made in the Congress to cut the U.S. troop presence in Europe over the last two decades. All have failed. We are now in sight of the first significant mutual force cut in Europe since World War II. This is an extremely poor time to fiddle with our allied security arrangements, all in the name of budget savings.

Mr. President, this amendment is mischievous in terms of our alliance with Europe and in terms of our arms control negotiating position. Even worse, the amendment will not accomplish the savings it promises. So all of the political damage we can do ourselves through this sort of ultimatum will not even yield us a budget windfall as compensation.

The amendment will not deliver, Mr. President, because it would only remove troops, not demobilize them. If you house these troops here at home, it will actually cost more. In Europe, keeping our forces in active status costs less thanks to the host nation support arrangements whereby our allies provide services and other items for free or below market cost.

But let's assume you demobilize these 30,000 troops we would bring home under this amendment. That will cost you as well, and besides that demobilization implies a restructuring of our defense resources that I do not see explained anywhere in the amendment. There are costs to such a transfer of troops and their demobilization. These costs do not yield more funds for education or deficit reduction.

If we want to really save money in the short run, we should insist on greater burden-sharing by our NATO Allies. I support that. And I support an eventual reduction of the U.S. military presence in Europe. However, this reduction must come as result of negotiations which yield more security, and smaller military deployments, in Europe. Those negotiations are underway. They may bear fruit in the near future. We should not endanger those negotiations for illusory budget savings. We should reject the amendment now before us.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I sympathize with the good intentions of the authors of this amendment. I share their concerns about the need for serious troop reductions in Europe and increasing our commitment to education programs at home. However, I will oppose this measure because it seriously undercuts our position at the negotiation on conventional Armed Forces in Europe.

Last May, I welcomed President Bush's long overdue proposal to reduce United States and Warsaw Pact combat forces in Europe. Since this announcement, negotiators from the United States, our NATO Allies and the Warsaw Pact have begun to engage in serious talks on reaching an agreement between NATO and Warsaw Pact proposals. Much remains to be done, but U.S. negotiators have been instructed to complete an agreement within 1 year and implementation by 1992.

Mr. President, Senator METZENBAUM has proposed that 30,000 U.S. personnel be withdrawn from Europe by the end of 1990, regardless of whether an agreement has been reached. If no agreement has been signed, our NATO Allies must reimburse the United States for the cost to keep 30,000 troops in Europe or else the personnel will be withdrawn.

I agree that there is presently a golden opportunity to reduce NATO and Warsaw Pact forces in Europe but we do not need to go about withdrawing our forces unilaterally. If this amendment were approved by the Senate, the Soviet Union would have little incentive to complete an agreement in 1990. They would know that with or without an agreement, U.S. troops will be cut by 30,000 in 1990.

This amendment also poses a serious threat to U.S. relations with our NATO Allies. The Soviet Union probably could not resist postponing a treaty simply to see the ensuing argument between NATO countries over who would foot the bill for 30,000 troops.

Mr. President, I agree with the authors of this amendment that the education of our children must be a clear priority. During consideration of the fiscal year 1990 budget resolution, I voted for an amendment offered by Senator SIMON that would have transferred $3 billion from defense to education programs. But I cannot support an amendment that poses such a serious threat to efforts to reduce United States and Soviet forces in Europe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the underlying amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM].

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

So the amendment (No. 889) was rejected.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. INOUYE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the Kerry amendment No. 887 to excepted committee amendment on page 83, lines 1 through 5, relating to Asat.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

AMENDMENT NO. 887, AS MODIFIED

Mr. INOUYE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to send to the desk a modified amendment in behalf of Senator KERRY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

If not, the amendment is so modified.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

In lieu of the Congress supposed to be stricken insert the following:

Congress makes the following findings:

The United States Government relies on satellites for communications, early warning of attack, monitoring compliance with arms control agreements, and many other vital national security functions;

Such satellites constitute vital integral parts of many United States weapons systems, command, control and communications systems, and other military systems;

It is essential to the national security of the United States that United States Government satellites not be vulnerable to antisatellite attacks;

It is in the national security interests of the United States and its allies to deter the development and testing of antisatellite weapons by the Soviet Union;

It is in the national security interests of the United States to undertake a balanced response to Soviet antisatellite capabilities, which includes a measured Asat program;

Key agencies of the executive branch are examining options for specific antisatellite arms control measures; Therefore:

The executive branch should conclude its examination of specific antisatellite arms control options and rules of the road for space activities without delay, and include its recommendations and conclusions from this examination in the report to Congress already required by the conference report on the fiscal year 1989 Dire Emergency Supplemental Appropriations act;

The President shall—with a view toward considering how to improve United States Asat arms control monitoring capabilities—assess the national security implications for the United States of a mutual deployment to cooperative monitoring and verification technologies; the results of such assessment shall be included in the above mentioned report;

As soon as practicable, the President should take advantage of the forum provided by the ongoing defense and space talks with the Soviet Union to explore—consistent with the conclusions of the above-mentioned report—adequately verifiable limitations on the development, testing, production, and deployment of weapons capable of directly threatening United States military satellites.

Mr. WALLOP addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate on the amendment?

Mr. WALLOP addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I have no intention of taking the time of the Senate more than just for a couple of minutes here to express my anxieties and my dislikes about this as a procedure in general, but not in particular on this amendment or anything else.

But I think the Senate has little place in counseling the President of the United States in the middle of negotiations especially after a session such as Jackson Hole in which the plate of the negotiators was generally filled up and directing our judgment as to what now should take place next. I bring it to the attention of the Senate as a generic complaint.

Having said that, I must say that Senator KERRY and the cosponsors have been agreeable in the negotiations. But I want to make a couple of points.

One is that just in the last couple of months the President of the United States has made major arms control negotiation initiatives. He has the open labs, and the followup proposal inviting the Soviets to visit Los Alamos and Capistrano.

The Soviet foreign minister replied favorably to it. This was the brainchild of our current space negotiator. The President has made at least one new proposal in every negotiating forum from Geneva, the START verification, the chemical warfare at the U.N., Threshold Test Ban Treaty.

Specifically to the amendment at hand of Senator KERRY, I say to the Senate that it is important to recognize that the Joint Chiefs of Staff have made the specific statement that America needs an Asat capability, irrespective of Soviet Asat capabilities. It seems to me that in this process we undercut the President in yet another area at a time when he is making significant progress on arms control.

Mr. President, I would like to place in the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD, a letter from Secretary Cheney to the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Senator NUNN, dated July 12. Just to quote briefly from it, "This report states that to ensure our freedom of action in space, the Department of Defense must have enduring space systems. Specifically, the DOD needs an operational Asat capability to deter and to counter the Soviet space systems in low-Earth orbit."

Mr. President, second, in a letter to Senator MCCLURE, dated today, September 28, from Brent Scowcroft, the President's National Security Adviser, he says, "In sum, it is essential for the United States to develop an operational Asat system to deter the Soviets from exploiting their space control and space-based targeting capabilities."

Third, a letter from the Secretary of Defense, again to the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Senator NUNN, dated August 1, in which he says, "As Admiral Crowe, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, has stated, to correct this imbalance, the report mandates that the United States develop and deploy an effective deterrent-in-kind Asat capability; not for space supremacy or superiority, but to ensure a measured, balanced response to Soviet space-based weapons systems and Asat capability."

I ask unanimous consent that those three letters be placed in the RECORD, Mr. President.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, DC, July 12, 1989.

Hon. SAM NUNN,
Chairman, Committee on Armed Services, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This letter forwards the 1989 Report to Congress on Space Control Capabilities, as required by Section 243 of the Fiscal Year 1989 Department of Defense Authorization Act.

Space control—the ability to conduct friendly operations in space and, when necessary and directed by the National Command Authority, to deny any adversary the use of those space systems which support hostile military forces—requires an integrated combination of anti-satellite capability, space surveillance and surviving and enduring assets.

This report states that to ensure our freedom of action in space, the Department of Defense must have enduring space systems. Specifically, the DoD needs an operational ASAT capability to deter and to counter the threat Soviet space systems in low-earth orbit pose to U.S. and Allied space and terrestrial forces. We must also provide for the survivability of critical space assets (including associated terrestrial components) to support essential command and control functions and operational military forces across the spectrum of conflict. Finally, we must have an integrated and effective attack warning and reaction capability which can detect and react to threats to U.S. space systems.

The report also addresses Soviet activity related to space control. The Soviet Union has a massive and expanding program. In the Soviet view, military superiority in outer space is achieved first, by the use of ASAT systems to degrade or destroy the space-based command, control and communications and intelligence systems of an enemy; and second, by the successful use of space to support military operations including the use of satellites to target an opponent's forces. We must not allow the Soviets to view space as a sanctuary from which they can threaten not only valuable U.S. and Allied space assets, but also the ground, sea and air forces so critical to our ability to deter both conventional and nuclear conflicts.

This report does not address arms control. However, the United States continues to consider space arms control options.

This report outlines the initial, fiscally prudent steps toward building an essential U.S. space control capability. The United States must build a solid foundation to ensure freedom of operations in space and an ability to deter and, if necessary, deny an adversary unrestricted use of space.

Another version of the Net Assessment of U.S. and Soviet Space Control Capabilities, at a higher level of classification, is being sent separately to the secure storage of the House and Senate Armed Services Committees.

Sincerely,

DICK CHENEY.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, DC, September 28, 1989.

Hon. JAMES MCCLURE,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MCCLURE: As the Senate considers funding the Administration's request for our ASAT program, I hope that you and your colleagues will bear in mind the importance of this program to the future of U.S. and Allied security. As a result of our review of national security strategy, undertaken earlier this year, the Administration reached important conclusions about the need for an ASAT program.

First, the Soviet Union has a massive military space program. It has the capability to interfere with key U.S. satellites, particularly those critical ones which operate at low altitude. Failure to provide a response in kind would perpetuate the existing situation in which the Soviet Union might attack U.S. and Allied systems, believing their space systems are not vulnerable to counterattack.

Second, and of possibly greater concern, the Soviets maintain military satellites whose sole purpose is to help defeat U.S. and Allied terrestrial forces in the event of conflict. If deterrence fails, the U.S. must be able in some manner to deny the force enhancements that the Soviets gain by the use of such over-the-horizon targeting of our naval and ground forces.

In sum, it is essential for the U.S. to develop an operational ASAT system to deter the Soviets from exploiting their space control and space-based targeting capabilities.

I appreciate your efforts to see that Congress addresses this serious gap in our overall ability to deter aggression.

Sincerely,

BRENT SCOWCROFT.

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, DC, August 1, 1989.

Hon. SAM NUNN,
Chairman, Committee on Armed Services, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Thank you for the opportunity to comment on S. 1328, the "Satellite Survivability Act of 1989". I share the view that the survivability of our key satellites is critical to U.S. national security, and the Department places a high priority on its efforts to enhance the survivability of those systems.

The basic premise of this bill is that the national security of the United States would be served if we were to forego the development and deployment of an antisatellite (ASAT) system, provided the Soviets avoid the three actions listed in the legislation. I strongly disagree with that premise. The United States needs an ASAT capability to counter Soviet targeting satellites in low earth orbit that pose a threat to our naval and ground forces and those of our allies, and to deter the use of existing Soviet ASAT systems. The proposed legislation is simply incorrect when it states that the co-orbital system is the only Soviet ASAT; the Soviets possess ASAT capabilities in ground-based lasers and ABM interceptors. Currently, a serious imbalance exists. As Admiral Crowe, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, has stated, to correct this imbalance "mandates that the United States develop and deploy an effective deterrent-in-kind ASAT capability; not for space supremacy or superiority, but to insure a measured, balanced response to Soviet space-based weapon systems and ASAT capability." Accordingly, we have requested funds to develop both kinetic and directed energy ASAT systems.

S. 1328 in effect would give the Soviets veto power over development and deployment of a U.S. ASAT system. As long as the Soviets avoid the three actions specified in the proposed legislation that would lift the testing prohibition, we could not test an ASAT weapon. Such limits on U.S. ASAT testing would not preclude the Soviets from maintaining their own ASAT capabilities and thus would not make our critical satellites more survivable. In addition, such limits would not reduce the threat posed by Soviet space-based targeting systems. Therefore, the proposed legislation would not only fail to make our satellites more survivable (its stated purpose), but it would preclude us from addressing a very serious threat to our security. Finally, the proposed prohibition on the use of any funds "to test any weapon against an object in orbit" also could limit severely the testing of SDI technologies with potential for intercepting nuclear warheads in space. Such unilateral limitations would go well beyond the restrictions contained in the 1972 ABM Treaty, and other Congressionally mandated provisions.

The Administration is conducting a thorough and ongoing study of ASAT arms control issues. The problems associated with ASAT arms control, including verification, definition, breakout, disclosure of information, and the need to counter Soviet targeting satellites, contribute to the conclusion that a comprehensive ban that would seek to eliminate testing and deployment of all specialized ASAT systems is not in the interest of U.S. national security. We are continuing to study options for specific ASAT arms control measures.

Finally, I object to the requirement for yet another report. The proliferation of reporting requirements are absorbing too much of the Department's time and resources. I believe that the close consideration of ASAT issues to be expected in the normal Congressional review of our funding requests would make the proposed ASAT report a redundant exercise.

In sum, I strongly opposed this bill. The United States urgently needs an operational ASAT capability. This bill, if enacted, would frustrate our efforts to obtain one.

The Office of Management and Budget advises that there is no objection to the submission of these views for your consideration and the consideration of the Committee.

Sincerely,

DICK CHENEY.

Mr. WALLOP. I thank the proposers of the amendment for their cooperation and courtesy in negotiating out what I think to be a satisfactory conclusion to it.

Again, I just express my view that this is not an appropriate role for the Senate of the United States to indulge itself in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

Mr. COHEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. COHEN. To follow up one argument raised by the Senator from Wyoming, that President Bush has made some very dramatic strides or taken some dramatic strides in trying to pursue some innovative initiative in the field of arms control, one of them, according to all reports, has to do with chemical weapons, probably the most difficult area that we will have to contend with in the field of verification.

For several years, a number of us have been working on trying to put money into the defense budget to stimulate some research and development of new technologies that will help in the verification of a chemical weapons treaty, in the event we ever have one. I wanted to commend the members of the Appropriations Subcommittee who have dealt with this, because there is money in this budget; $15 million was included in the Senate version and House version, subject to a fence. The fence is very important, because the Defense Department, as of last year, was required to submit a report outlining a well-defined program for research and development to pursue these initiatives for verification of chemical weapons. They have yet to file that report, even though they were mandated to do so under last year's bill.

So it seems to me, if President Bush wishes to take this initiative—and I commend him for it—at the very least, we have to have a report from the Defense Department. I think the fencing arrangement is one that is wise. I would hope that the Defense Department would take it very much into consideration. We are saying that we are not going forward with the appropriation for this very important type of research and development unless you give us the report that is required.

I want to commend my friend from Hawaii and also my friend from Alaska.

Mr. INOUYE. Thank you very much.

Mr. HELMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, may I inquire what the pending business is; excepted amendment No. 4?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No. The Kerry amendment to the excepted committee amendment. We are on the Kerry amendment to the excepted committee amendment No. 4.

Mr. JEFFORDS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Just a couple of words. It is for the reason stated by the Senator from Wyoming that we very substantially modified the original amendment proposed by Mr. KERRY and myself, with the recognition that we are in a very sensitive time with respect to negotiations and, thus, we worked it out with the members of the administration, as well as the Senator from Wyoming and others, so that we would not have any controversy, and hopefully have an amendment which was satisfactory to both sides.

It is satisfactory to us, because it does accentuate the need both of our own national security perspective as well as for peace in space, to be able to bring forward the discussion and the report that is required and has been required under the appropriations bill in the area of ASAT's. So I want to thank those that worked with us. I believe what we are doing now will in no way injure the ability of the President to continue in the tremendous efforts he is making in pursuing the various negotiations on START and others, and hopefully we will have a voice vote and be on to the next issue. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, this modified amendment has been cleared by the administration, by the Department of Defense, by the Armed Services Committee, the Appropriations Committee, and both managers. I urge its adoption.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, there are a lot of weapons systems in this bill. Hundreds of them, maybe thousands. And I believe that, possibly with a few exceptions, these are all important and worthwhile systems. But there are very few weapons in here, maybe only one, that are real war winners. By that I mean, if we have them, we win. If we do not have them, we lose.

If there is one such weapon in this bill, it is the antisatellite system. Or more precisely, the two components of our ASAT R&D effort, the kinetic and directed energy weapons systems. This system is important because it would redress a critical imbalance in our military posture vis-a-vis the Soviets: the Soviet monopoly on antisatellite weapons. This monopoly gives the Soviets a sanctuary in space. They can destroy our satellites without fear of retaliation. And they can use their satellites to target our land and sea forces with impunity.

In one of his final statements as Defense Secretary, Frank Carlucci described the lack of an ASAT as "the single most serious deficiency in our military posture." The Joint Chiefs expressed a similar view in their 1989 Joint Military Net Assessment.

What is interesting is that this same Joint Net Assessment took such a generally mellow view of Soviet intentions and capabilities, that it was cited by Fred Kaplan of the Boston Globe as an indication that the Pentagon had succumbed to "Gorbymania." But even this "kinder, gentler" Pentagon is sufficiently concerned about the Soviet ASAT threat that it identifies our lack of an ASAT as one of our most serious deficiencies.

To really appreciate the role of an ASAT, you have to talk to the commander in chief of the U.S. Army in Europe, Gen. Crosbie Saint. Because if the Soviets can use space with impunity to target our ground forces in Europe, and the naval forces we rely on to bring over reinforcements and supplies, then we will probably lose the war. Likewise, if the Soviets are able to deny us the use of space to support our operations in Europe, we will be unable to carry out the deep-strike attacks we would rely on to defeat a Soviet attack. A future land battle in Europe would in all likelihood be won or lost in space. As General Saint says, "I see an effective ASAT system as the key to the control of space and also conceivably as the key to victory."

Let me stress something here. A lot of my colleagues here have been very vocal in their support for conventional arms and the need to improve our conventional deterrent in Europe. And frequently they have opposed systems like ASAT because these allegedly fancy high-technology systems supposedly took funds away from the troops in Europe.

But here we have the commander in chief of U.S. Forces in Europe, the commander of NATO's critical Central Army Group, our top ground-pounder in Europe, telling us that victory on the ground depends on support from space.

After all, control over the high ground is not exactly a new concept in military thinking. The imperative of seizing the high ground, for surveillance or attack, has been around since the first caveman hit another caveman on the head with a club.

The Soviets are ahead of us in applying this ancient concept to the use of space. Sure, we use space for military surveillance and communications. But the Soviets have gone a lot further than we have in thinking through the concepts of space and space control. It's not enough to capture the high ground. You have to be able to hold it. Or at least, keep the enemy from holding it.

So it is unfortunate that we now find ourselves under pressure from the arms control lobby to cede control of space to the Soviet Union. I appreciate the willingness of the sponsors of the amendment to modify it to meet the concerns of the administration and the committee. But the original amendment they planned to offer included a ban on testing against an object in space. So I think it's appropriate at this time to consider the implications of such a ban.

The Soviets have been very upfront on how they would use space in wartime. According to the Soviet military dictionary, their goals are to "deny the use of space to other states, and to assure maximum space-based military support for Soviet * * * combat operations on land, at sea, in air, and in outer space."

In other words, use space to support attacks on enemy ground, naval, and air assets, and deny the enemy the use of space to target Soviet forces.

And the Soviets have, and are developing, the hardware to match their doctrine. They continue to maintain an operational coorbital ASAT in a constant state of readiness. They maintain ABM and electronic warfare systems with ASAT capabilities. They have lasers with ASAT potential.

Which brings us to all the old myths about the Soviet ASAT: It is, we are told, primitive. It was not very impressive in tests, we are told, and it hasn't been tested since 1982. Therefore, we are told, it does not pose a threat.

Consider the facts. The Soviet coorbital ASAT is primitive the same way a baseball bat is primitive. I have used this analogy on the floor before, but I will repeat it because I think it makes the point. If you are in a fight, and the other guy has a baseball bat and you do not, it does not matter how primitive that baseball bat is.

As for the test results, without getting into classified material, let us just say this: The Soviets have enough ASAT's on deck so that, even with their observed probability of kill, they have the capability to destroy enough of our high-value satellites to cripple our reconnaissance, intelligence, and other capabilities.

What about testing? The Soviets have not conducted an end-to-end test of their coorbital ASAT since 1982. But they do routinely test the components, including the launch vehicle, tracking radars, and on-orbit command techniques. And they maintain their ASAT fleet in a constant state of readiness.

What about the infamous Soviet laser at Sary Shagan? There has been a lot of back and forth between the members of the NRDC delegation and the Defense Department about which laser the NRDC delegation saw. And we have had some discussion with the Defense Department over just how much we can say about what the NRDC saw and didn't see. The NRDC says it saw the laser that the Pentagon has identified as the major ASAT threat. The Defense Department points out that the delegation visited only one of the four major laser research areas at Sary Shagan, and that the area they visited was not the area that contains the most modern equipment.

The NRDC says the building they saw is the building that the Pentagon depicted as housing the most threatening Soviet laser. The Pentagon will only confirm, for open discussion, that just because that building was depicted in Soviet Military Power, does not mean that that building houses the laser that the Pentagon had identified as the most significant ASAT threat.

What about the underlying premise of an ASAT test ban, which seems to be this: since the United States is supposedly more dependent on space-based assets, we supposedly have more to lose than the Soviets, so we should not develop an ASAT because that will cause the Soviets to develop even more ASAT's and we will be the net loser. Development of a U.S. ASAT, we are told, would be destabilizing

But what is destabilizing is the current state of affairs, where the Soviets have an ASAT and we do not! I cannot see why our satellites are safer, why we are somehow better off, if the Soviets have an ASAT and we do not. We lose both ways. Since there is nothing to deter an attack on United States satellites, we jeopardize our own ability to use space in support of our military operations. And we give the Soviets a sanctuary from which they can target our terrestrial forces with impunity. What's so stabilizing about that?

Of course, as in any wartime situation, space operations would require some difficult decisions about the relative values of deterrence and warfighting. ASAT opponents say you cannot have an ASAT for deterrence and for warfighting too. That is just not true. Why do we have nuclear weapons? Why do we have any weapons? To deter aggression, but if deterrence fails, to win. There is no contradiction there. It could be that in wartime the United States would elect not to use its ASAT against Soviet satellites because we felt the long-term exchange ratio would be unfavorable. But that would be our choice. Supporters of this amendment want to place the fate of our satellites, and to a great extent our ground and naval forces, in Soviet hands.

As I said earlier, the Soviets have thought this issue through. As the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Admiral Crowe, told the Defense Appropriations subcommittee: "The Soviets * * * have prepared themselves and are ready, especially with the coorbital interceptor, to fight and fight successfully. We have nothing aproaching that capability—thus the need for a U.S. ASAT capability is essential."

Admiral Crowe concludes, "We cannot relinquish control of space to an adversary whose intent is clear."

Mr. President, we need to keep Admiral Crowe's remarks in mind as we debate the ASAT issue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, as modified.

The amendment (No. 887), as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment is disposed of. The question is on agreeing to the fifth excepted committee amendment.

Mr. HELMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

AMENDMENT NO. 891 TO EXCEPTED COMMITTEE AMENDMENT ON PAGE 107, LINE 12, THROUGH PAGE 108, LINE 4

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I have an amendment I send to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HELMS] proposes an amendment numbered 891 to excepted committee amendment on page 107, line 12, through page 108, line 4. At the end of the amendment add the following:

It is the sense of the Senate that the conferees on H.R. 2788 should insist on that amendment numbered (7) to H.R. 2788 which states "None of the funds authorized to be appropriated pursuant to this Act may be used to promote, disseminate, or produce—

"(1) obscene or indecent materials, including but not limited to depictions of sadomasochism, homoeroticism, the exploitation of children, or individuals engaged in sex acts; or

"(2) material which denigrates the objects or beliefs of the adherents of a particular religion or nonreligion; or

"(3) material which denigrates, debases, or reviles a person, group, or class of citizens on the basis of race, creed, sex, handicap, age, or national origin.".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, a lot of games have been played in connection with the amendment that was approved by a voice vote July 26 in the Senate on the interior appropriations bill.

The House of Representatives ducked vote and the conferees are tied up trying to decide how they can avoid taking a stand on this important issue. The conferees want to water it down. They want to misrepresent it. There have been all sorts of declarations by various House Members as well as the liberal news media of this country, saying this is censorship, which is not true. The people who are saying that know it is not the case. The Senate should stick by its amendment. Therefore, I want the Senate to vote on it.

Mr. President, the controversy surrounding the improper use of Federal funds by way of the National Endowment of the Arts [NEA], to support so-called works of art by people like Andres Serrano and Robert Mapplethorpe, is about to be emasculated in conference.

The Interior appropriations conferees are finished for today, but sometime tomorrow they will take it up again and they will diddle around with language trying to water it down. If Senators want to do that, fine, but I think the Senate should vote to instruct the Senate conferees to insist on the Senate amendment. I am willing to take as much time as Senators want me to to discuss this amendment.

The amendment I sent to the desk is in fact a sense-of-the-Senate resolution that the Senate conferees should support the Senate's amendment to the interior appropriations bill to ensure that the American taxpayers' money will never be used again to pay for pornography or attacks on religion.

I believe most Senators are familiar with the amendment that I offered to the Interior appropriations bill and that it would prevent the NEA and other Federal so-called arts agencies from using Federal funds to pay for art that is obscene or indecent or which degrades religion. If artists want to go in a men's room and write dirty words on the wall, let them furnish their own crayons; let them furnish their own wall. But do not ask the taxpayers to support it with their hard-earned money. That is all the amendment says. No tax fund shall be used for garbage just because some self-appointed experts have been foolish enough to call it art.

The efforts of my distinguished colleagues from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and from Idaho [Mr. MCCLURE] to address this issue in both the Appropriations Subcommittee on the Interior and the full Appropriations Committee by cutting off funding to specific institutions for 5 years have met with the same unfounded outcry from the self-appointed, self-proclaimed arts community that my amendment has confronted for the past several weeks.

Let me make it clear that I did not offer my amendment to the Interior appropriations bill because I disagreed with those efforts, but because I felt that the committee's provision would not prevent such blasphemous and immoral behavior by all the other institutions or artists using Government funds in the future.

Mr. President, the Government's official approval functions as an automatic guarantee of artistic competence and excellence.

Back in 1981, Frank Saunders, who was on the staff of vice president for cultural affairs for the Philip Morris Co. told the Senate and the House back in 1981, and I quote him:

Few businesses are adventurous and few are prepared to stick the company money on creative, speculative art forms. But when given the stamp of approval of the National Endowment, such art does have a chance at the board room.

That means that artists can get corporate money if they can get respectability—even if it's undeserved—from the National Endowment for the Arts.

And that is what this is all about. It is an issue of soaking the taxpayer to fund the homosexual pornography of Robert Mapplethorpe, who died of AIDS while spending the last years of his life promoting homosexuality.

If any Senator does not know what I am talking about in terms of the art that I have protested, then I will be glad to show him the photographs. Many Senators have seen them, and without exception everyone has been sickened by what he saw.

Mr. President, these self-proclaimed art experts, under the banner of art, would have us view pornography on aesthetic but never moral grounds. But do we really believe that the experts themselves view this filth with the moral neutrality that they have urged upon the public? I think not.

I have taken some of these pictures around to various groups, and I said, if you really want to see what I am talking about, do not read the Washington Post; do not read the New York Times; look at the pictures. The Washington Post and the New York Times and other knee-jerk editors around the country have erroneously asserted that restricting Federal funding for the arts constitutes censorship.

I do not care what so-called artists do on their own time with their own money. But I do say, Mr. President, that when they start saying to the Congress of the United States: "Butt out and just hand over the money," this Senator says "No." That is the crux of the problem, Mr. President.

The critics of my amendment would have us leave the discretion of who to fund to experts like this. If we do that, I can guarantee you that Mapplethorpe will not be the last pornographic show funded by the NEA. We must tell these experts that the NEA is not to be on the offending edge and that the public purse was never meant to fund obscene, indecent, or blasphemous works of art.

Mr. President, to indicate how phony some of these so-called art experts are, let me read you a letter I received. I do not know Mr. Joseph Lovece, Jr., of New Rochelle, NY, but he wrote me as follows. He said:

DEAR SENATOR HELMS: I support your views regarding the taxpayers financial support of the art world. I have a little story to tell you:

Not long ago I moved into a contemporary residence and used this situation to commit a hoax upon my learned friends. I invited them over for a cocktail party in order to obtain their help in selecting modern art for this residence. My friends were aware of the fact that I know very little about art, and I made it known to them that I did not care for the so-called modern art. I had a number of modern art paintings available that evening to select from. I told my friends that the paintings looked like garbage to me. I was told I just don't understand what the artist meant, they went on to explain their interpretation of the artists work. They asked me how much the artist wanted for various paintings. One painting I said was worth 11, and my friend said I shouldn't pay more than 6,000 for it. Another one of my friends asked me about another, I said was worth 5, and he said more than 6,000 for it. Another one of my friends asked me about 5,000 is a good buy. What they didn't realize when I said 11 and 5, was that I meant $11.00 and $5.00. It was at this time that I told them I was the artist.

Then Mr. Lovece concludes by saying:

I painted all this garbage in less than three hours. All my learned friends were telling me what the artist meant. I (the artist) still don't know what I meant when I put the paint on the canvas. End of story.

Good luck.

Sincerely,

JOSEPH LOVECE, Jr.

Mr. President, Mr. Lovece's little game is played out time and again by the NEA and the arts community. But when the NEA does it, the hoax is pulled on the American taxpayer.

Mr. President, when I offered my amendment in July that was approved on a voice vote in the Senate, the papers declared that Mr. HELMS had slipped into the Senate Chamber and got this amendment passed in the dead of night.

The truth of the matter is that I walked into this Chamber, sat in that chair until I had a propitious moment with the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD, former majority leader of this Senate and a distinguished American. I went over to Senator BYRD, I said, "Senator, I've got a little amendment I wish you to look at." I showed it to him. He looked up at me. I said, "Now let me show you where I am coming from." And I showed him the pictures. And he said, "Good Lord, I will take the amendment." And he did and it passed on a voice vote. I did not ask for a rollcall vote. But since so many misrepresentations have been floating across the land, I decided the Senate of the United States should vote on this question of whether or not we want this kind of garbage to be funded with the American taxpayers' money.

Mr. President, I realize that at 8 o'clock we are supposed to turn back to the catastrophic insurance matter. I did not think that a unanimous consent order has been agreed to, but I am perfectly willing to abide by whatever the leadership wants.

In the meantime, however, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? Is there a sufficient second?

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must first determine if there is a sufficient second.

Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, before I yield the floor, I have the photographs here at my desk. So any Senator who thinks that I am attacking aesthetic art needs to come over here and look at the photos. Do not just take the word of the Washington Post or the New York Times. Do not believe the multitude of editors who have been so careless with the truth. See for yourself what the NEA calls art worthy of taxpayer support. I yield the floor.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXCEPTED COMMITTEE AMENDMENT BEGINNING ON PAGE 107, LINE 12, AS MODIFIED

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the fifth excepted committee amendment be modified with the understanding that the Helms amendment in the second degree retain its status.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. INOUYE. Am I correct that with this unanimous consent the yeas and nays have been ordered on the Helms amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the Helms amendment.

Mr. INOUYE. I send to the desk the modified amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

SEC. . (a) Of the amounts appropriated for research development, test and evaluation under title IV of this Act, not more than $26,552,000 may be made available through the National Defense Stockpile Transaction Fund for grants to support ongoing projects for strategic materials research, facilities, equipment, and related activities at institutions of higher education;

(b) The Secretary of Defense may make the grant awards pursuant to subsection (a) without regard to the requirements of sections 2361 and 2304 of title 10, U.S.C., which are superceded specifically by this section for the purpose of making the above mentioned grants: Provided, That the Secretary of Defense shall transmit a report, within sixty days of enactment of this Act, to the Committee on Appropriations and Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives which contains an evaluation on whether such grant supports the objectives established by the Strategic and Critical Materials Stock Piling Act as amended: Provided further, That no funds shall be obligated for grant awards pursuant to subsection (a) until thirty days after receipt of such report by the above-named Committees: Provided further, That, notwithstanding any other provision of law, no funds provided in any other appropriation act for fiscal year 1990 may be obligated for strategic materials research facilities.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, this amendment proposes a substitute provision for a general provision in our bill, section 9099, which relates to strategic materials research and development grants. This substitute addresses several concerns raised by various Members of the Senate regarding the practice of earmarking defense budget funding for specific institutions of higher education.

The committee's original provision set aside $37,552,000 of funds made available for defense research, development, test and evaluation for grants for strategic materials research, facilities, equipment, and related activities at eight institutions of higher education. The grants funds would be provided through the national defense stockpile transaction fund for both ongoing and new projects.

The substitute amendment eliminates $11,000,000 for three new projects and provides $26,552,000 through the stockpile transaction fund for five ongoing projects in strategic materials research and development.

The intention of this amendment to is protect these five ongoing projects from the unintended impacts of recent congressional initiatives to increase competition among colleges and universities for defense department research funds.

These congressional initiatives were intended to increase the competition among colleges and universities for research funds in the future. They were not intended to penalize or interrupt ongoing projects for which funds were appropriated previously and which are well underway.

Several of these ongoing projects include significant contributions from non-Federal sources. These contributions from State governments and private sources represent a willingness to enter into partnerships with the Federal Government to reduce the Nation's dependence on foreign strategic materials and to advance the quality of public and private higher education.

The Federal Government should not renege on its share of these existing partnerships, Mr. President, even as it takes the laudable step of increasing future competition among colleges and univesities for Federal research dollars.

The Federal Government should not help erect the four walls and floor of a house built partially in its own interest, and then deny the assistance needed to put a good roof over the structure.

These partnerships were entered into in good faith by the State governments and private donors. This amendment enables the United States to take advantage of these non-Federal contributions and to fulfill its role in these partnerships.

The grants for the Unversities of Utah, Hawaii, Idaho, and Texas-El Paso, and for Loyola College of Maryland, are for projects funded before through the stockpile transaction fund.

The grants would be for the following amounts: First, University of Utah, $8,900,000; second, University of Hawaii at Manoa, $6,000,000; third, University of Texas at El Paso, $4,152,000; fourth, University of Idaho, $4,000,000; and fifth, Loyola College of Maryland, $3,500,000.

Mr. President, the stockpile transaction fund was used as a mechanism to provide grants for strategic materials research activities, including purchase of sophisticated equipment and construction of facilities, when it was administered by the General Services Administration.

Responsibility for the transaction fund was transferred to the Defense Department by Executive order in 1988, and administration of it has been assigned to the Defense Logistics Agency.

The committee believes it is reasonable to increase the amount of congressional oversight over the use of the stockpile transaction fund for these ongoing projects. Therefore, the substitute amendment retains the language of the original provision which provides the Secretary of Defense the opportunity to review and report on these projects.

Within 60 days after enactment of the Fiscal Year 1990 Defense Appropriations Act, the Secretary of Defense is to report to Congress an evaluation whether the grant supports the objectives established by the Strategic and Critical Materials Stock Piling Act, as amended.

The provision directs that the report be submitted to the Committees on Appropriations and Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The general provision further provides that no funds shall be obligated for these grant awards until 30 days after the committees receive the Secretary's report. The substitute language, however, addresses the concerns expressed by some that the original language contained a requirement that the committee approve the Secretary's report. That requirement is eliminated from the substitute provision.

Mr. President, this amendment has been discussed with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, who has been a leader in increasing competition for defense-related research funds.

I move the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. HELMS. It is a modified committee amendment having nothing to do with the Helms amendment?

Mr. INOUYE. Nothing to do with the Helms amendment.

Mr. President, I notice that in 2 minutes we will reach the hour of 8. We had an earlier understanding that at 8 p.m. the McCain amendment would be in order for consideration. And so to comply with that understanding, I ask unanimous consent that the present matter be temporarily set aside to consider the McCain amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I would advise the distinguished manager of the bill that it is my present intent to suggest after the catastrophic matter is resolved the Helms amendment again become the pending business. I am going to ask that all the pages and all the ladies, maybe all the staff leave the Chamber so that Senators can see exactly what they are voting on. There has been so much misrepresentation about this matter that I want Senators at least to know exactly what I have been talking about all along. So I advise the Senate that is my present intent.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk continued the call of the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the majority leader be authorized to lay before the Senate a bill to be introduced by Senator McCAIN described as the Catastrophic Reform Act prior to the Senate's consideration of the reconciliation bill, but in any event not later than 2 p.m. on Saturday, October 7.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, I would like to thank the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee for allowing this issue to be brought up in the form of a freestanding bill; I would like to thank the majority and minority leaders for their efforts; and I would like to assure the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee that once this bill and issue is resolved, disposition of the freestanding bill, I will not propose any amendment to the reconciliation bill that has anything to do with catastrophic.

Mr. BENTSEN. My understanding was that if the Senator had the opportunity to bring up a freestanding vehicle, he would not then thereafter bring it up on reconciliation; is that correct.

Mr. McCAIN. I believe that is what I said, Mr. President. I thank the Senator for clarifying it.

Mr. FORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. President, may I ask the distinguished Senator from Arizona, his bill will be basically the amendment he was attempting to offer this evening?

Mr. McCAIN. That is correct.

Mr. FORD. Then that means it is just a delay and not elimination of the catastrophic illness health insurance?

Mr. McCAIN. No. The amendment as it was very briefly described in a preserving of many of the benefits including catastrophic hospitalization and most others, repeal of prescription drugs and some other parts of the bill in order to eliminate the surtax, yet maintain the $4.80 part B payment that is being kept now. I will be glad to run through them.

Mr. FORD. No, I do not want the Senator to do that.

Mr. McCAIN. It is not delay, it is repeal of some portions, maintaining of others.

Mr. FORD. But it is basically the amendment.

Mr. President, still reserving the right, this bill can be amended to eliminate catastrophic, can it not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the understanding of the Chair that the bill will be open for amendment.

Mr. BENTSEN. Further let me comment, as the Senator was explaining the provisions of this bill, our information from CBO is that it is approximately $6 billion and we will be making a point of order on that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the majority leader?

Mr. SARBANES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland seek recognition to object to the unanimous-consent request by the majority leader?

Mr. SARBANES. The Senator from Maryland seeks recognition to make a reservation in order to make an inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland is recognized for reservation and a point of order.

Mr. SARBANES. Is it my understanding that part of the unanimous-consent request is that this issue will not be brought up on reconciliation once the freestanding bill and any amendments thereto are considered?

Mr. BENTSEN. It is not my understanding. My understanding is that it will not be brought up by the Senator from Arizona. He cannot speak for other Members of the Senate, obviously; nor can I.

Mr. SARBANES. Is it the chairman's desire that that be included as part of the request?

Mr. BENTSEN. I would be pleased with it but that was not the agreement. It was not the agreement that others could not bring it up on reconciliation. That was not the agreement. Obviously, it is going to be subject to the Byrd rule.

Mr. SARBANES. Subject to what?

Mr. BENTSEN. Subject to the Byrd rule. We get into questions of germaneness and questions of revenue, it remain revenue neutral, remain subject to all of those things if they try to do it on reconciliation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the majority leader?

Hearing none, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. MITCHELL. What is the pending business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is the Helms amendment to the fifth excepted committee amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that upon disposition of the Helms amendment and the underlying amendment, that no further amendments be in order to H.R. 3072, that the bill be read a third time, and a vote on final passage occur without any intervening action or debate.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Reserving the right to object, I understand there is another amendment that has been agreed to, a Hatfield amendment for the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. INOUYE. It has been agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. That is correct.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then, Mr. President, I modify my request to add upon disposition of the Helms amendment, the underlying amendment and the Hatfield amendment, the Hatfield amendment being described as an amendment to the McKinney Homeless Act, that the request be modified to add that to the two amendments that I described earlier, and I renew my request.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, did I understand that the McKinney amendment that is being proposed by Senator HATFIELD has impact on labor matters concerning the building of housing? Can we be apprised as to what it is?

Mr. STEVENS. It is cosponsored by Senator KENNEDY, Senator HATCH and offered by Senator HATFIELD as the ranking minority member of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, it was my understanding that Senator NUNN was working on an amendment and I thought that the terms of the amendment had been worked out. But I am not sure of that.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am advised that is the underlying committee amendment to which I referred in my unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request by the majority leader. Hearing none, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the Chair and I thank my colleagues.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who seeks recognition?

Mr. WIRTH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. WIRTH. Everybody in the body should understand where we are. The amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, the so-called Mapplethorpe amendment, is an issue that came onto the floor, Senators will remember, in the dark of the night. People really did not know what was happening at that time, and the amendment went through. Since then, Members are aware of the extraordinary storm that has arisen, not only from the arts community but from all of those who believe in the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I need not remind my colleagues of what the first amendment says. What we have is a resolution in front of us that relates directly to the first amendment. Senators tonight have no opportunity to do anything but vote up or down. There is no place to go on this one, and it seems to me that what we must do in all good conscience as defenders of the Constitution is to clearly vote no.

Now, I understand what is going to transpire out of this is that our good friends in the media on the negative world are going to have a field day with this particular amendment. The time has come for us to make very clear we understand that is going to go on, we understand that presumably Senators in the greatest deliberative body in the world should not be allowing ourselves to be diverted with this kind of activity but, rather, should belly up and be serious about the defense of the Constitution of the United States.

Here we are in the Senate, and I have now been here for 2½ years. I will say that I have enormous respect for this institution and the way in which this institution respects minorities, the way in which this institution protects small States, and the whole way in which this institution was set up.

But it seems to me, Mr. President, we are getting to the point where we are being asked to cast a lot of votes, make a lot of alleged political statements for the purpose of not what the body was set up to do, but rather for a variety of other reasons.

I understand and respect the right of every individual in the Senate to be able to get up and offer whatever amendments he or she wants to. But after a time, it seems to me the time has come to begin to think how we are going to go about drawing the line on this sort of thing.

I, for one, am really fed up with it. I think we ought to take this one on up or down, and then take on the issue overall, seeing what other kinds of amendments get added when this sort of thing come up again and seeing what other kinds of steps we are going to take when this comes up again because we have gotten to the end of the rope. We are here in egregious violation of the first amendment.

I hope everyone will vote no on the Helms amendment very clearly understanding that we know precisely what this is all about.

I yield the floor.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, the distinguished junior Senator from Colorado would like to make this an issue about the first amendment to the Constitution. I think the only way you can do that is to not read the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The Senator from North Carolina is not saying anything about the ability of artists to express themselves in any way they please. In fact, in no way does he address their freedom of action. What he says is that the taxpayers should not pay for things that basically represent what is considered by the great majority of taxpayers to be pornography or to be offensive.

Basically what we are talking about here is that a person was paid $15,000 for 10 photographs, one of which is a photograph of a crucifix in a bottle of urine. I submit to Members of the Senate that if somebody wants to take pictures of a crucifix in a bottle of urine, it may be terribly offensive to most of us in the Senate, but they have every freedom to do that. What we are talking about here is the taxpayer being forced to subsidize the $15,000 to do it.

I submit that the working men and women of America strenuously object to that, and I think every taxpayer in America looked at these pictures that they have helped pay for involuntarily, they would feel nauseated, and they would demand that we act. The distinguished Senator from North Carolina has given us an opportunity to do that.

This issue has absolutely nothing to do with freedom of speech. We have been hearing for a month now all this business about how the Helms amendment would have banned parts of Chaucer. I submit, Mr. President, that the Helms amendment bans nothing. But I also submit that probably the taxpayers should not have paid for the writing of the "Tales of the Wife of Bath."

The issue is very clear-cut, and I do not think we ought to be distorting the issue. The issue is should we be taking the fruits of the labor of the working men and women of America and spending that money on the photos that we have all seen. I submit we should not.

I think if the American people saw these pictures, and I am grateful that my children will not, they would find them revolting, and I think it is very important that we stop funding this so-called art.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I am a member of that conference, which is a job that is unenviable at this point. I think there are a number of things we can all agree upon.

First, I think most of us would agree there should be a National Endowment for the Arts, that there should be money in this country to seek to get the best art we can.

Second, I think that endowment should have procedures calculated to produce significant art, not junk, not abusive, not insulting art.

Third, we as Members of Congress should avoid censorship because censorship and fine art simply do not go together. I think most would agree with that.

Fourth, I think we would agree that the two examples, the Serrano piece, that is the crucifix in the urine, was unacceptable, insulting to the basic principles of everybody in the country, including everybody in this body; that the Mapplethorpe photograph collection was without redeeming social value, was obscene, absurd, and without any justification whatsoever by any standard; that next, that should be avoided in the future.

The question is, the basic question, How did it happen, and how can it be prevented in the future? As I understand it, Mr. President, it happened not because the NEA has some set of standards that says we should fund this kind of outrage.

To the contrary, I think it happened because of a laxity in procedure whereby the NEA not only would allow a mistake like this to get through the sieve, but because they had a procedure not calculated to produce the best of art. If they did, these kinds of examples would have violated everybody's sense, anybody's sense of that which is proper, that which is acceptable, that which not only should be subsidized by the taxpayers but that which should be acceptable in any art gallery anywhere in the country.

So the question is, What do we do about it? Mr. President, I have a lot of sympathy for the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. And my initial inclination was to say let us go with it, the way he has these things phrased in there about you should not have something that offends someone's religion, or race, or whatever, sounds like a good test.

Then I started reading it more closely, and then I realized that it is not only censorship going in—that is, censorship that is hard to define and that is before the work of art if ever produced—but it is dealing in an area that is so hard to define that to attempt to put it in words is very difficult.

I tried to do the same thing. I thought, well, maybe he has not quite achieved the proper results, so I put my hand to it yesterday, and then today I read my own words, and said, well, that is not tough enough and yet it is too tough. It is the kind of censorship that in the hands of a censor they would not look at it in the same way I would, which might restrict some of the world's greatest art. Or on the other hand, it might let through the sieve a Serrano situation.

So, Mr. President, all I can tell you is that it is very difficult. But to adopt this formulation, I think, is probably the wrong formulation, that if you give us time on the conference committee, I think there are members of that conference who are entirely in sympathy with the goal of the Senator from North Carolina; that is, to prevent a repetition of the Serrano and Mapplethorpe excesses, and who will try to design a system calculated to prevent that without at the same time endowing somebody with the power of censorship who might not apply that censorship for that which is artistically and socially significant, and yet, in balance, does not do damage to the sensibilities of most Americans, a very difficult balancing act. I do not know whether we can do it. I think we can do better than the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, and I think we ought to be given a chance. The control of the Senate conferees, I can tell you, is in the hands of people who are sympathetic with the goal of the Senator from North Carolina. I think that if you give us a chance, we will try to carry that out and prevent a repetition of these excesses to which his amendment is addressed.

Mr. LEAHY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President in many ways this debate is a little bit silly. We have before us the Department of Defense appropriations bill. We do not have before us a catalog of the Corcoran Art Gallery or anywhere else. We are, after all, the most powerful Nation in the world. We are debating how the United States spends over $300 billion to keep troops worldwide.

We have a Navy able to go in any ocean anywhere in the world, and the ability to maintain a nuclear arsenal that our parents never could have conceived. We have before us the questions of what kind of Air Force we will have, what kind of a Navy, Marine Corps, and what kind of Army.

We have worldwide responsibilities to our allies and to nations that require our protection, as well as the protection of our own citizens on U.S. soil. Now, Mr. President, what do we suddenly have before us? A question of judgment by somebody using the aegis of the National Endowment for the Arts, to bring it up. It certainly has nothing to do with the Department of Defense.

As one who holds his own religion dearly, as a Catholic, I find very, very offensive the Serrano piece of what he calls art. I cannot help but think, as I watch interviews that go on with him and others, that he delights in what is happening because he has received so much publicity, even if it might mean destroying the National Endowment for the Arts as he does it.

Apparently, the issue is no longer how we defend the United States; it is no longer the Department of Defense. It is really not free speech, because we have the right of free speech, all of us, and we will protect that no matter how difficult it might seem at times. Any artist is able to do what he or she wants with his or her own money and time. The question basically is: Do we destroy the National Endowment of the Arts? Do we throw the baby out with the bath water?

The National Endowment of the Arts has been in existence for a quarter of a century. It has distributed more than 85,000 grants around this country. During that 25 years, we probably have not had 25 times in those 85,000 grants where there was controversy over them. In my own little State of Vermont—my administrative assistant Ellen Lovell pointed out to me tonight—NEA grants have brought poets into classrooms; they made children in my State of Vermont eager to read and write; they brought film series into towns, and they showed people in Vermont towns a truly American art form. They bring music to our mountains, and they bring grace to our lives. Much of what we have, the sense of culture that all of us in this body would embrace we have received in my own little State of Vermont through NEA grants.

Now, we find the Serrano work offensive, of course. I do, and I cannot believe that there are Members of this body, no matter what their religions might be, that do not find it offensive. The crucifix happens to be a very revered symbol of my own religion. I would be just as offended if I found a symbol of any other person's religion as the subject matter, whether Jew, Christian, Moslem, or anything else. But that is not the issue.

We stand here with the possibility of destroying, in effect, the NEA. We created it to have independent review panels—not to be second guessed on every decision. Really, is there any work of art that somebody could not attack one way or the other? So we have to ask ourselves: Do we want the NEA or not?

You know, Mr. President, the part of the debate that we do not hear on the floor is the part of the debate going on in the Cloakrooms, going on in the Senate dining room, going on as some of us talk to our political advisers, and that is the part about what 30-second ad might come out of this. If you vote against this amendment, can you not see the 30-second ad: "Senator So-and-So voted for pornography tonight. Senator So-and-So wants to waste taxpayers' dollars so that you do not have enough money to buy your home. He wants that money to go to produce pornographic pictures of children, or people performing what would be labeled as unnatural sex acts or whatever. That is what Senator So-and-So wants." You can imagine these political ads as well as I can.

Mr. President, there are really two issues here, beyond free speech, and beyond the question of the defense of the United States, because I can imagine somebody at the Pentagon who is looking at this and saying, "Wait a minute, what does this have to do with the MX, Trident II, F-16's, or deployed forces in Europe or anything else? But there are two issues. The practical issue, first and foremost, is do we destroy the NEA, and its review system, the NEA that has distributed 85,000 grants, and made art so accessible to millions of Americans for nearly a quarter of a century? Do we destroy its ability to function without politicians deciding what is and what isn't acceptable art?

The other issue, Mr. President, is the issue nobody wants to come up here and talk about. It is that someday, if you vote against this amendment and do the right thing, if you protect the National Endowment for the Arts, then somebody is going to run that 30-second ad and say, "Senator So-and-So supports pornography; Senator So-and-So wants your tax dollars spent for pornography."

Mr. President, in many ways, the press has set the scene for this debate. I read editorials in newspapers across this country questioning why the U.S. Senate had a voice vote; why the U.S. Senate has not stood up and voted forthrightly on this. If you asked them, do they want to print the pictures in question in their newspapers or poll their readers, they would say, we cannot do that, of course, because that might affect us, and our circulation. But of course, we want you to be brave and bold.

Well, it is one thing to sit in an ivory tower and make that point, but the fact is that tomorrow or the next day the press will go on to some other issue; this one will not be revisited, and the message that will be left to fill in for them will be the 30-second ads. That is really where we are. A lot of Senators know what is the right thing to do here, if you want to protect NEA and I want to protect the NEA. I think the NEA is good for this country.

I also happen to think the NEA has made a few mistakes. I find many of these photographs very, very offensive. I certainly find it offensive to my religion, and offensive to me as a person.

But I also find that I am enriched and my State is enriched and the people of my State are enriched by the National Endowment for the Arts, as has this country and as have all the other 49 States.

I think what we are saying here is, do we spell the death knell for the NEA or not, or do we, as the distinguished Senator from Louisiana has suggested and I think quite rightly decide this matter in the committee of conference and let us work on the issue there. There is no member on that committee of conference that is not a patriotic American, nobody on there that is somehow some sort of sexual pervert or pornographer. There is no member on that committee of conference that embraces the subjects of the photographs and all that we have talked about here. Why not let the system work, and get on with the Department of Defense appropriations bill here.

I will close with this Mr. President, because I know other Senators want to talk. Let us not as U.S. Senators, as those who are supposed to be the conscience of this Nation, kill the NEA because we are terrified of somebody's 30-second ad in our next election.

This debate is not about free speech. Even though it is the Defense bill it is not about defense. It is whether we will have a National Endowment of the Arts. We decided that nearly 25 years ago. Let's not reverse the decision tonight.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I have unfortunately had the opportunity to look very briefly at the exhibits that the Senator from North Carolina has brought to the floor and everything that has been said about them is true. These are gross. These are terrible. These are totally indefensible. I do not think they are art.

Mr. President, however I do not believe that the issue before us tonight is whether we like or do not like these pictures. I do not like them and my guess is that not a single resident of my State would like them. They would not like the idea of the Government paying for them. I am sorry Government did pay for them.

That is not the issue before us. The issue is very simple: The Senator from Texas used the expression, and I think it was very well chosen, the question is: What is suitable art? And the issue before the Senate is very simple, and it is whether we in the U.S. Senate should attempt to make definitions of what we consider to be suitable art.

Maybe there should not be any National Endowment for the Arts. Maybe the Government should never be in the business of making judgments of taste, because that is what the NEA does. I think that is an arguable position. But the question is not whether the NEA should do it or not do it. We have already decided that. The NEA is in that business.

The question is whether we in the Congress of the United States should try to establish some criteria by which we define what is or is not suitable art. That is what the Senator from North Carolina does by his amendment. His amendment does not say that the Mapplethorpe exhibition is pornography and it should not be funded. He does not say that. He goes much more broadly than that. He does not say that Mr. Serrano should or should not be funded by the NEA.

He goes much more broadly than that in the terms of his amendment, and I want to read a couple paragraphs because we have been focusing on obscenity and I think everybody knows that obscenity has been a problem for the Supreme Court of the United States. But he also says in paragraph 2 that the amendment covers material which denigrates the objects or beliefs of the adherents of a particular religion on nonreligion.

Mr. President, consider what that means: Material which denigrates the object or beliefs of the adherents of a particular religion or nonreligion.

Does it denigrate the object of a religion to portray Christ as a clown? Well, the musical Godspell did just that. It portrayed Christ as a clown. Could it be found by some administrator that the portrayal of Christ as a clown denigrates the object of somebody's religion? Of course it could.

Godspell probably would be covered by the breadth of this amendment.

How about a portrayal of Christ as a wild animal? Would that portrayal denigrate a person's religion? Well, C.S. Lewis did that in "The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe." It was a book about Christianity and the Christ figure was a lion and some administrator, some bureaucrat could have said that denigrates a person's religion. C.S. Lewis spent his academic and literary life describing his religious beliefs which were very, very profound beliefs.

How about in the world of music? Could it be said that the beliefs of the Quaker faith are denigrated by Onward Christian Soldiers Marching as to War?

And then how about the question of race. I remember from my own part of the country, "Tom Sawyer" and "Huckleberry Finn." There have been those throughout the last number of decades who have tried for one reason or another to get "Tom Sawyer" and "Huckleberry Finn" off of the shelves of our schools.

This amendment would say that "Tom Sawyer" would not have qualified for an NEA grant and "Huckleberry Finn" because it could be argued that they denigrated an individual, namely Nigger Jim, as he was called according to his race.

Or how about creed? Can we think of anything in the annals of literature that denigrates an individual because of his religion? How about the "Merchant of Venice"? How about William Shakespeare himself? Would that be covered by this amendment? I think it would be. This amendment is not just about Mapplethorpe. It is also about Shakespeare.

And in our own time in American literature Alice Walker's great little book, "The Color Purple," made into a movie, clearly denigrates men.

And this amendment says that material that denigrates or reviles a person on the basis of sex falls within the parameters. I take it that "The Color Purple" would not have qualified for an NEA grant.

How about age? I do not remember the name of the book, but I do remember that Bill Cosby, the famous comedian, wrote a book about kids. It is a spoof of children, and his television programs are always doing that. And I take it that those programs and that book denigrate people on the basis of age.

Then there is national origin which is also covered, material that denigrates or reviles on the basis of national origin. Perhaps "The Godfather"—the head of Paramount Theaters was visiting with me recently. I said what is the greatest movie you ever made? He said the two Godfather movies taken together, absolutely the essence of American art, and it would be covered by this amendment.

I am not for Mapplethorpe. I am sick that a dollar of taxpayer money went to pay for this kind of junk. I am sick about it. I could just see the faces of the people of Sedalia, or Cabool, or Mountain Grove, MO, if they were told that they had to pay for this. It truly is outlandish. That is not the issue.

The issue is: How good are we at defining whether something is suitable art or not suitable art and how do we draw those definitions? And should we really write definitions on the floor of the Senate which cover "Godspell," and "Tom Sawyer," and the "Merchant of Venice," and "The Color Purple," and "The Godfather?" Mr. President, I think the answer is no.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DANFORTH. Of course.

Mr. JOHNSTON. First of all, I want to congratulate the Senator from Missouri for one of the more eloquent speeches I have heard on the floor of the Senate. Really outstanding. I congratulate him for that. Second, he dealt with the difficulties of religion and definitions. But he also mentioned, quoted in the amendment, that it also covers a nonreligion.

Now, would the Senator care to talk about what a nonreligion is? Would that include Ku Klux Klan? Would it include one of these Nazi cults? What does nonreligion include?

Mr. DANFORTH. Well I would certainly think that it would include cults. I would think that it would include organizations that had a kind of pseudoreligious bent to them; cross burning might be one.

It could include literally anything under the Sun. I suppose that what is not religious in nonreligion.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Well the Ku Klux Klan for example can get protection from the Federal courts in the first amendment. I am a strong supporter of the first amendment. Surely under this language the Ku Klux Klan would be able to find some support, does the Senator not believe, because of the broadness of this language?

Mr. DANFORTH. I would think that their lawyers would be looking into it the day after this becomes law.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. I hesitate to speak after the eloquence of our colleague from Missouri, but I will for just a moment or two because what Senator JOHNSTON just talked about is extremely important.

That paragraph 2 says, "Material which denigrates the objects or beliefs of the adherents of a particular religion or nonreligion." That would mean you cannot have any art that in any way denigrates the Ku Klux Klan. You could not have any anticommunist literature or painting or art production.

For example, Michelangelo, much of his work was of a religious nature.

Groups who are adherents to a nonreligion, let us say, the organized atheists would object to Michelangelo getting any subsidy from the National Endowment for the Arts. Or let us say that someone wants to do an art work about the Holocaust, the devastation that was meted out to the Jewish people. Well, we have these neo-Nazi groups who are adherents of a particular nonreligion who could object to that.

I just do not think we want to go in this direction. I do not question the intent of the Senator from North Carolina. But this is far, far too sweeping.

Yes, there was an outrage in funding of these two pieces and there would not be a Member of the Senate who would vote for funding those. But let us not just massively do harm to this Nation because of two mistakes made by the National Endowment for the Arts.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I wish to join the Senator from Illinois in commending my friend from Missouri. I would take only a slightly different approach to the point which he made. Beginning by saying that I agreed with almost everything which my distinguished friend from Texas said, except for his conclusion, and disagreed with much of what the first speaker, the Senator from Colorado, said, except for his conclusion.

I do not believe that there is any duty under the first amendment for the taxpayers of the United States to support Mapplethorpe or Serrano, or for that matter, any art. If the Senator from North Carolina had simply suggested striking the appropriation for the National Endowment for the Arts we could have had a debate over that subject. He did not. He simply restricts what the Government, through the National Endowment for the Arts, can accomplish.

I have already spoken at length and I hope with some eloquence on the total inappropriateness of funding either of these exhibits, or either of these so-called artists, on the part of the National Endowment for the Arts. I have advocated that the entities which were subsidized by the National Endowment for the Arts be deprived from any further grants for a period of 5 years, and that is exactly what the committee in the bill which this body has passed and has in conference now did. A highly appropriate response to a highly inappropriate use of Federal money through the National Endowment for the Arts.

But it is totally inappropriate for the proponents of this amendment to equate an opposition, first, either to the so-called art which they criticize or to a Federal subsidy for the arts with this amendment. This amendment goes so far beyond our natural and appropriate objections to those two particular art exhibits as to be absolutely absurd and totally dangerous, whether or not it is constitutional. And I do not express any view on that subject right now.

I want to concentrate a little bit more precisely perhaps than even the Senator from Missouri did on a few of the operative words in this amendment. This amendment does not simply prohibit the National Endowment for the Arts from spending money to produce this or any other kind of art. The operative words in the beginning are "promote or disseminate." And then when we drop down to the third subsection material which denigrates—a very broad term—a person, a group or class, on the basis of race, creed, sex, handicap, age, or national origin. Obviously as the Senator from Missouri said that would prohibit the National Endowment for the Arts from distributing a book of Mark Twain's novels or Shakespeare in any volume certainly, which included the "Merchant of Venice." But it would go far beyond that.

In fact, Mr. President, we have in the rotunda of the Russell Building an exhibit now which would violate the theory of this particular amendment were it to apply to the Congress as well as to the National Endowment for the Arts. If you will look at that exhibit of the history of the Senate, and the larger exhibit which begins today in the Library of Congress on the history of the Congress, you will see political cartoons from the 19th century which denigrate Irish, Catholics, and many other groups in the standard form of 19th century political attack. But individuals are attacked on the basis of their national origin or their religion.

This amendment would prohibit even in an exhibit of the history of politics in the United States the famous cartoon from late 19th century, "Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion," as my friend the Senator from New York well understands. It would certainly prohibit any current exhibit of political cartoons attacking Jim and Tammy Bakker, or for that matter the Ayatollah Khomeini could not be disseminated even after they were produced as examples of American art or American political cartooning by any money from the people of the United States.

This amendment is not connected with Serrano and Mapplethorpe. It is not connected with them. It deals with an area so much more broad as to be fatally flawed for that overbreadth.

I commend to the Members of this body a view of exactly what the Appropriations Committee did, quite appropriately, to discipline the National Endowment for the Arts for its terribly flawed judgment in connection with these two exhibits. That kind of prohibition against any money for a 5-year period for the two organizations which promoted and disseminated and caused or aided in the production of these exhibits will be a salutary discipline indicating to the National Endowment for the Arts that there are certain standards which the people of the United States and the Congress of the United States demand.

But, to say that a wide range of the fine arts and the literature and the politcal cartooning of the history of the Western World cannot so much as be disseminated by the use of any Federal money is simply to deny our own history and our own culture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LIEBERMAN). The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I am not at this hour going to attempt to go into all of the issues that are brought about by this discussion. I do take the time only to correct a misapprehension that I find in much of the mail that I am getting on this subject.

The question whether it is appropriate or not for the Senate of the United States or the Congress of the United States to attempt to set standards is not the issue. I agree with the Senator from Missouri. He was very eloquent indeed and he was addressing the right question, that we ought to be talking about in this amendment. But there are others who have not done so.

Mr. President, I am angry. I am angry, and I think all of the people who are concerned about Government funding of the arts ought to be angry also. I am angry because an error of judgment or errors of judgment have reduced the public support that is essential for public support for the arts.

I believe that instead of saying we should not discuss this issue, people out in the art community should be saying: Those people that made that decision to produce and disseminate this art did something fundamentally to hurt public support for the arts of this country. And I am angry that they did that.

What is the appropriate answer to that question? I thank the Senator from Washington for pointing to the provision in the Senate bill that provides for a ban on the funding of two particular institutions for a period of 5 years. I think that is appropriate. I am the author of that provision. I did that because I want to focus on those who caused the problem and not upon the arts more broadly.

But the misapprehension to which I wish to draw attention tonight is that this is somehow constitutionally banned infringement of first amendment rights. This is not my opinion.

I want to read from an opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Regan v. Taxation With Representation of Washington, a 1983 case, 461 U.S. 540 and following. I read from page 548 and 549.

The court of appeals, in discussing first amendment rights on a discretionary basis, suggested that "strict scrutiny applies whenever Congress subsidizes some speech, but not all speech. That is not the law."

That is the Supreme Court, in a unanimous decision.

Or, later in the same opinion, it says, "We have held in several contexts that a legislature's decision not to subsidize the exercise of a fundamental right does not infringe the right, and thus is not subject to strict scrutiny."

In the Buckley versus Valeo case, it was argued that the provision that allowed "Federal funds for candidates for public office who enter primary campaigns, but does not provide funds for candidates who do not run in party primaries * * *" was subject to challenge under first amendment and equal protection provisions. The Court said, "We rejected first amendment and equal protection challenges to the provision without applying strict scrutiny."

After listing a number of other Supreme Court cases they said in these cases they "considered legislative decisions not to subsidize abortions, even though other medical procedures were subsidized. We decline to apply strict scrutiny and rejected equal protection challenges to the statutes."

I take a little bit of time to read from this unanimous decision of the Supreme Court in 1983 so we do not divert ourselves into the question of whether or not we are unconstitutionally infringing with rights of free speech guaranteed under the first amendment.

It is clear under this decision that the Congress can, if they desire, establish standards. As to the question of the wisdom of whether to apply standards or whether or not the standards applied are wise, that is a different debate. And that is an appropriate debate.

I will conclude only by saying: If, indeed, if the conclusion of some, as it may well be, that we should fund the arts and not establish any standards, then we begin to trouble the Senator from Idaho and I know we trouble the people I represent, because they are not very anxious to have their money, taken from then, to be given to someone else to spend with absolutely no standards.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLURE. I will be happy to yield to my friend from Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I very much appreciate the Senator's remarks and I think the Senator should know the Senator from Idaho is one of the leaders on this conference. The Senator from Alaska, Senator STEVENS, is one of the strong leaders in this conference, along with Senator RUDMAN, one of the strong leaders in this conference, as is Senator BYRD.

We do now have what is traditionally called the more liberal side of this body who is leading on this issue. We have those who tend to be in sympathy with those who would criticize Serrano and Mapplethorpe, and who will try to do that which is appropriate to prevent it.

Would the Senator agree with that point?

Mr. McCLURE. I certainly agree with my good friend from Louisiana, indeed, there are many on the conference who are very thoughtful and I hope will try to take the appropriate action.

I think the Senator knows from our discussions in the conference this afternoon that I believe we ought to attempt, in statute, to set some standard. I am not comfortable with the idea that it is our duty to provide money, but it is not our place to say how it should be spent. I am not comfortable with that notion.

As difficult as it is to set standards, I think we must. I, again, quote from the Court, Justice Rehnquist, writing the opinion on behalf of the Court in the Regan case when he said: "For the purposes of these cases appropriations are comparable to tax exemptions and deductions, which are also a matter of grace that Congress can, of course, disallow. * * *"

I think it is within our power to do it. I hope we have the wisdom to do it well. And I am going to vote for the Helms amendment, knowing that even with this direction to the conferees, the conferees will be challenged in the conference with the other body to uphold the Senate position but, nevertheless, in the spirit of compromise, which is always there in a conference, to come up with language which is acceptable to both bodies. That is our challenge. That is what I will try to do as a member of the conference.

I do not believe that voting for the Helms amendment deprives us of that opportunity and it certainly underscores that responsibility.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLURE. I will be happy to yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am the chairman of the conference. And those Senators who have been most active in trying to develop language to deal with this matter are Senators JOHNSTON and McCLURE and RUDMAN and STEVENS. There are two sides sitting at that table. We are very conscious of our duties as conferees. We always attempt to uphold the Senate's position on a matter. It is a matter of give and take when you go to conference. You cannot have everything your way no matter who instructs whom. But I want to say to my colleagues that this matter has probably been the most thorny matter to confront our conference.

We have been talking about this matter from the beginning, mostly other Senators, I say. I have had other things to consume my time and my energies. Staffs have discussed this from the beginning, and we have been meeting over a period of many days in preconference meetings, preconference sessions. Senator McCLURE and I have been in those preconference sessions with Mr. YATES and Mr. REGULA.

Mr. McCLURE. For hours.

Mr. BYRD. Hours. I think it is obvious to anyone who has sat in on the conference that this matter is something of genuine concern to all the conferees. I have been just as offended as anyone could be by the so-called art, but what we are trying to do is to develop something that is workable, effective, something that gets to the heart of the matter.

We are not talking about first amendment rights. Nobody can keep an artist from drawing whatever he wishes or painting whatever picture he wishes or sculpting whatever image he wishes, but it is whether or not the taxpayers of this country are going to subsidize that which is offensive. And I should think what we are talking about here would be offensive certainly to an overwhelming majority of the American people—offensive. It is obnoxious. It is disgraceful, in my view. But to say that is not to say that it is easy to work out with other conferees, considering the fact that there are Members of both bodies who will probably have to contend with this issue again when the conference report goes back to the two bodies. We have to get something that will be passed by both bodies, and that will get to the crux of the matter and prevent the use of the taxpayers' money in the future.

So I say to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, we conferees take just as seriously our responsibilities as does the author of the amendment, and I sympathize with what he is trying to get out. I accepted that amendment here when the Interior appropriations bill was before the Senate. When the bill was before the Senate, I accepted the amendment and said we would take it to conference. I am in sympathy with the amendment, and had there been a vote on it, I would have voted for it. But developing a piece of legislation that will meet the court tests and get to the gravamen of the problem is an extremely difficult thing.

Having said that, may I say to my friend from North Carolina that the appropriate time for him to raise this question would be when amendments are brought back in disagreement, and this is probably one that will be brought back in disagreement. He certainly has a right to raise it here, but as a conferee, I will pay no attention whatsoever to this instruction. Conferees are not bound by the instructions of the Senate. The Senate can instruct all it wants. Those instructions are not binding on the conferees. They are still exercising their own free will, and Senate conferees normally try to uphold the Senate's position. That is what we are trying to do. That is what we are trying to do in conference.

These Senators who I have named have given the best of their talents, and they are very talented men in word craftsmanship, and they are trying to take into consideration all of the pros and cons that might be advanced by Members on both sides of the aisle, on all sides of the question. So to offer another instruction here is really an exercise in futility, as far as I am concerned.

As a Senate conferee, I am going to do my job to the best of my ability to uphold the views of the Senate, but I am not going to follow the instructions of this amendment or any other amendment or resolution that might be introduced on this subject. We are going to do the best we can, and that is all we can do.

So I would say to my friend, he can perhaps get a vote here. Perhaps that is what he wants. I do not mind voting on it, but as far an instructing these conferees, it is a waste of time.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho retains the floor.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, as I indicated earlier, certainly the conferees have a very difficult task, and I accept the move by the Senator from North Carolina in the motion to instruct the conferees as an extraordinary action, something which we do not ordinarily do. While certainly the Senate cannot bind the conferees in a way which makes it impossible for us to act in the conference, this Senator will attempt to carry out, as best I can, whatever the instructions of the Senate may be.

As I said earlier, I will vote for the motion to instruct knowing the difficulty of trying to accomplish in the conference what the motion will set before us as our task.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLURE. But knowing as I do from the discussions we have already had in the conference that the conferees on the part of the other body are not going to simply take what we take into the conference. That is the nature of the conference.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLURE. But I guess I differ a little with my friend from West Virginia in that I do not believe a motion by any Senator voted upon by the full Senate means nothing. It means something, but it certainly cannot bind us.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLURE. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. HATCH. I would like to ask some questions. I personally believe the distinguished Senator from North Carolina has done the whole country a service. This morning the Labor and Human Resources Committee, upon which I am the ranking member, unanimously passed a new head of the National Endowment for the Arts, John Frohnmayer. Everybody agrees that he is going to be a wonderful leader of the National Endowment for the Arts. I strongly support him; I strongly support the Endowment.

I want to ask the distinguished Senator from Idaho, does he believe it helps for this body to send a message to the other body that we want you to not only consider the Helms amendment, but if you can improve upon it, as the distinguished Senator from Louisiana says he will, that you will do so? Does that not have efficacy, at least to the distinguished Senator from Idaho, as to the wishes of not only the distinguished Senator from North Carolina but millions and millions of people across this country who are sick of this type of stuff? All they are saying is artists can do whatever they want to do, and I uphold their rights to do, but they do not have a right to come to us and say, "Fund us. Send us $15,000 here, $12,000 here, $35,000 here," and then use the funds to denigrate things people in America value greatly. Basically my question is, if we vote for this motion tonight, does it not help us in dealing with the House?

Mr. McCLURE. I think it is obvious, in answer to the Senator from Utah, that a vote for the Helms motion this evening will strengthen the position of the Senate conferees in negotiating with the other body with respect to this issue.

If the motion is defeated in this body tonight, then the position of the Senate will be diminished in our conference with the other body.

Mr. HATCH. Again, another question. I have seen the hue and cry all over this country by those who are strong supporters of the arts, and I happen to be a strong supporter of the arts. Many of them have tried to justify what has gone on. We see one of the major galleries down here lose a $1 million gift because they had the temerity to cancel the Mapplethorpe exhibition.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield on that point? I very much commend the directors of the Corcoran for canceling——

Mr. HATCH. I do, too.

Mr. McCLURE [continuing]. The exhibit. I recognize that whoever was in the position to make a gift to them has the right to give it or withhold it on the basis of how they exercise their judgment. And that is what we seek to give to the Congress of the United States, the same right that that individual donor exercised.

Mr. HATCH. Would not the distinguished Senator from Idaho agree, despite the hue and cry about this amendment, its objective is really quite reasonable, and that is that the taxpayers should not be forced to subsidize this type of awful material?

Mr. McCLURE. I agree.

Mr. HATCH. I do not see how anybody who looks at those photographs can say this is the type of stuff we ought to be subsidizing.

Mr. McCLURE. I agree.

Mr. HATCH. That is what this is all about, and that is why the distinguished Senator from North Carolina brought this particular motion at this time. He wants us to vote not because he thinks the conferees are going to have to adopt the Helms amendment word for word. He wants us to vote to help the American people understand that we in the Senate are concerned that sometimes the Endowment goes too far, and maybe this is a very appropriate day to send that message, since today we reported out of committee the next head of the National Endowment for the Arts, who I believe will do what is right. But this message goes out on behalf of every taxpayer in America who is sick of that type of stuff. Would that not be a fair appraisal?

Mr. McCLURE. Yes. I see the issue in the same way the Senator does. The Senator from Washington earlier commended the position that the Senate had taken in focusing on two offending institutions that had misused the trust and abused the trust of the American public.

The other body, I would say, is opposed to those provisions, and therefore we are in the conference likely to be faced with a demand. We have been faced with a demand on the part of the conferees, on the part of the other body, to drop those provisions. I am very reluctant to drop those provisions, if indeed we have not attempted at all to set any kinds of standards. And they are asking us not to set any standards and not to take any direct action either.

I think our position in the conference will be strengthened if the Helms motion is adopted this evening.

Mr. HATCH. I have watched with a great deal of interest the utter calumny that has come down upon the head of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, once the Senate adopted this amendment.

There has been screaming and shouting all over this country by people whose views on this matter, I think, fly in the face of what the average American really believes.

Mr. McCLURE. I say to the Senator from Utah I think a great deal of the criticism of the actions being taken are without any reference to the kind of material which was produced and disseminated. I think many, many, many of those people who have contacted us and said take no action, set no standards, have no idea of the kind of debased material that we have seen as a result of these two exhibits.

Mr. HATCH. They have no idea. I want to compliment the distinguished Senator from West Virginia. He hit the nail on the head. I also compliment the distinguished Senator from Missouri, who made very eloquent remarks.

There is no question that the National Endowment for the Arts, even if this amendment were adopted in toto, word for word, would be able to put out Shakespeare's "Taming of the Shrew" or "Huckleberry Finn," Mark Twain's great classic.

The fact is the distinguished Senator from West Virginia hit the nail on the head. We should not be subsidizing offensive material. And those photographs recently funded by the Endowment are offensive.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. HATCH. I cannot yield.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the Senator from Idaho let me ask a question?

Mr. HATCH. If I can finish what I am trying to do. Let me just say this. Even if the distinguished Senator from Missouri was right, so what? We are talking about the National Endowment for the Arts and their limited role with limited funding to subsidize worthwhile projects of today.

Now, I prefer that issue to never come up, and I hope the conferees will resolve it to everyone's satisfaction. But do not tell me that this amendment is unconstitutional because it is not, nor is it a first amendment problem. It is not.

The fact is we have the right to do this if we want. It may be advisable, it may be inadvisable, and I think there are plenty of arguments on both sides. But my basic question is this. Should the taxpayers be forced to subsidize material denigrating religious beliefs or artifacts as we have seen attacked here in the material which has led to the introduction of this amendment?

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I would say that the real question that was addressed by the Senator from Missouri with respect to what kind of standards should we set or can we set any is that we are debating, not the question of whether we have the legal right or the constitutional capacity. I think that is beyond question.

But I do think that the question of whether we can write a statute that allows us to have more confidence in the expenditure of the taxpayers' money is really the gravamen of this argument.

We were in the conference wrestling with that today. We will be again tomorrow. We are going to do our level best to answer that question in a way that satisfies not only this body but the American people.

I do not think the Helms motion of this evening will harm us in that effort. I think it will help us in that effort.

Mr. HATCH. Let me ask——

Mr. METZENBAUM. Regular order, Mr. President. One Senator may not yield to another.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has the floor unless he is about to yield it.

Mr. McCLURE. I say to my friend from Ohio, I was not yielding to anyone else. I was seeking to yield the floor.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PELL], is recognized.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I think we all start out equally revolted, disgusted by the Serrano picture of the crucifix in urine and Mapplethorpe's deeply digusting pictures. We all agree on this.

However, I find this debate of particular interest because I am the only survivor in the Congress amongst the principal sponsors of the legislation that established the NEA in 1965. We held at that time exhaustive hearings starting in 1963 in previous Congress.

We were concerned at that point over the problem of Government censorship. We did not want to become like Iran or Nazi Germany, and the fear amongst us as we drew up the charter or the legislative language of the National Endowment of the Arts was to make sure there could be no Government interference or censorship.

As President Johnson said in 1965:

We fully recognize that no government can call artistic excellence into existence. It must flow from the quality of the society and the good fortune of the nation. Nor should any government seek to restrict the freedom of the artists to pursue his calling in his own way. Freedom is an essential condition for the artist, and in proportion as freedom is diminished so is the prospect of artistic achievement.

I recognize there that license should not be confused with freedom, as it may have been in the two instances under consideration. We sought at the time, though, to incorporate these cautions of President Johnson in the very language of the legislation.

Thus the legislation reads today:

In the administration of this act no Department, agency, officer or employee of the United States shall exercise any direction, supervision, or control over the policy determination, personnel, or curriculum or the administration or operation of any school or non-Federal agency, institution, organization, or association.

Over the years since that time there have been some 85,000 grants made, of which half a dozen, maybe a dozen, have been questionable or in very bad taste like Serrano and the Mapplethorpe ones. Early in August, concerned with this problem, I wrote a formal letter to the acting chairman of the Arts Endowment to the effect that the National Council on the Arts should undertake a full-scale review of grant procedures, and report to me. Their conclusions will be incorporated into the Endowment's reauthorization process, which to my mind is the place where this discussion should occur.

This is an authorizing problem, not an appropriating problem, and in the reauthorization, which will be coming along before too long, this matter will obviously be discussed.

As it is now, if the amendment passed, if it is followed literally, we would find sculpture like Rodin's The Kiss or Michelangelo's figures in the Sistine Chapel forbidden. I do not think we mean to do that.

So my own hope is that we should defeat the pending amendment.

Finally, I ask unanimous consent that a letter from the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] and me written to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD] on this subject be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND HUMAN RESOURCES,
Washington, DC, September 12, 1989.

Hon. ROBERT C. BYRD,
Chairman, Subcommittee on the Interior, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: As Chairman of the Labor and Human Resources Committee and its Subcommittee on Education, Arts and Humanities, which have legislative jurisdiction over the National Foundation on the Arts and Humanities, we are writing to express our deep concern over the pending Interior Appropriations bill and its effect on the Foundation.

We oppose the provision which would prohibit the National Endowment for the Arts from supporting any proposals by the Southeastern Center for Contemporary Art in Winston-Salem, North Carolina and the Institute for Contemporary Art at the University of Pennsylvania for a five-year period, regardless of the merit or quality of their prospective proposals. While the Endowment's oversight procedures were too lax in permitting the grants in question to be made, this provision is unreasonably punitive and we object to the proposal on policy grounds, and we also believe that it is subject to serious constitutional objections.

A second provision, proposed by Senator Helms and adopted by the full Senate, jeopardizes protections for freedom of speech and expression and raises additional questions of constitutionality. This amendment, which also proscribes limitations on use of Endowment funds, is vague and overbroad.

Virtually any work of art under the provision could be rejected as offensive to one group or another. Since no objective standards are established, the provision is an invitation to abuse through the application of subjective and arbitrary standards.

We support the peer panel review system at the Endowment and feel it has achieved an exemplary record for the agency over the past 24 years. The study mandated by the bill on the grant process, along with appropriate limitations on subgranting, will effectively address accountability and oversight requirements of the Endowments. We intend to continue to work closely with the Endowment during the upcoming reauthorization deliberations to ensure that effective guidelines and standards are applied.

We support the Committee's recommendations on funding levels for the Endowments, but we strongly urge the Conference Committee to delete the unwise provisions we have mentioned.

Thank you for your consideration and courtesy in this regard. With best wishes,

Sincerely,

CLAIBORNE PELL,
EDWARD M. KENNEDY.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. RUDMAN] is recognized.

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I am a member of the conference the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee referred to a few moments ago. That conference has in fact been laboring mightily to try to meet the wishes generally expressed by the Senator from North Carolina. I might say that there has been substantial movement in that conference. The Senator from North Carolina came to this floor on the appropriations bill and submitted this amendment which was accepted. I dare say with great respect to my friend from West Virginia that, had more of us been on the floor, we might have had a debate about that. We might have convinced the Senator from North Carolina that if he had limited that amendment in some way, we might not be here tonight because I submit several things to you: that we ought not to get too hysterical about this because there is one section of the Senator from North Carolina's amendment that not only makes sense but is easily dealt with.

There is a landmark decision in this country in the area of obscenity called Miller versus the United States. The Miller case, decided in 1973, and modified in some way, sets a standard of obscenity. If the art community truly believes that the U.S. Congress does not have the right to say that appropriated moneys should not be used for production of obscene material, called art or otherwise, then they do not understand the Constitution or the powers of the Congress. Certainly we can do that. That is not a first amendment issue. The issue is what standard do you use?

The Senator from Louisiana, the Senator from Idaho, and others have been discussing taking the exact language of the Miller case, which is the law of the land, not just for NEA, but for anyone, and simply saying that is a standard which we would like the NEA to use.

I think we are fairly close to getting some agreement on having that happen. There is nothing wrong with that. The Congress of the United States has every right to say that art or works of alleged art produced with taxpayers' funds should meet the U.S. Supreme Court standard for obscenity. It is not unreasonable.

Unfortunately, the Senator from North Carolina went beyond that, and had I been on the floor that night, I would have strongly urged him to drop sections 2 and 3 of this resolution we have here before us.

With all great respect to my learned friend from Utah, who just spoke, who I know is an experienced lawyer, I must say as one who practiced law for a long time as attorney general of my State, argued many cases in every appellate court you can think of, that if you read these two phrases, if two ever qualified to get struck down for vagueness and imprecision, it is these two: "material which denigrates the objects or beliefs of the adherents of a particular religion or nonreligion." Or, three: "material which denigrates, debases, or reviles a person, group, or class of citizens on the basis of race, creed, sex, handicap, age, or national origin."

Mr. President, let us get down to the facts here. I do not think anyone can ask any agency to enforce that kind of a standard. It is unenforceable. Everybody knows unless this is just a political vote as someone suggested here earlier, it is going to cut both ways. Nobody could enforce that standard.

Somebody may get up here on the floor in a few moments and say they can, but if they say that, I want to ask them the simple question, How many cases have they tried in the obscenity area and how many cases have they briefed? Because I have and I know others on this floor have. I know the majority leader heard such cases as a U.S. district court judge. You cannot meet that standard. But you could meet the standard in paragraph 1, because the standard in paragraph 1 is in fact inclusive within the Miller language. There is no question. If anybody doubts it, read the Miller language. We have it. We read it this afternoon.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUDMAN. I am pleased to yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator agree that the word "indecent" in the first paragraph is not in the Miller language?

Mr. RUDMAN. Absolutely.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator agree that the first paragraph with the word "indecent" stricken would be enforceable?

Mr. RUDMAN. As usual, my friend from Maine as a Federal judge and majority leader has great precision. He is absolutely correct. The word "incident" does not appear. As a matter of fact, the Miller language sets forth a number of standards and then sets forth a model statute, unusual for the U.S. Supreme Court, and says if you follow this statute it will be OK with us.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator will yield further, will the Senator agree that the phrase "incident" is not a standard which is now susceptible to definition by the Supreme Court precedent as is the phrase "obscene?"

Mr. RUDMAN. The majority leader is precisely correct. That is exactly in the Miller case.

Let me conclude by simply saying this: If the Senator from North Carolina wants to get at the Mapplethorpe exhibit—which, frankly, Mr. President, we have talked about, and it is trash. I must say to the arts community in my State that has written to me, please do not write me any more letters defending that trash. It is trash. Do not call it art. If it is art, it is art to people with twisted minds. But do not throw out the baby with the bathwater.

If my friend from North Carolina came to this floor with the language of the Miller, case, which is right on point, and everybody knows what it means, then I could support that easily. And I would have supported this as it is in article I, even though I think it is a bit vague. But I cannot in good conscience vote for a resolution that contains Nos. 2 and 3.

One last thing: The Senator from North Carolina, I am sure, is going to say that the Congress has the power to narrow beyond the Miller case, and we do. Let me simply say that if we want to do something that is enforceable, I suggest we use a standard that everybody understands. I would like to think we would pass laws around here that can be enforced, and achieve a purpose.

I commend the Senator from North Carolina for raising the issue. It is an important issue. I think the obscenity aspect of it can be treated with, and I believe the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Idaho and others tomorrow in the conference will meet that issue. I do not think we can meet issues 2 and 3 because they are impossible to define, and I respect the Senator for what he is trying to do. I just do not think he did it with Nos. 2 and 3.

Mr. HELMS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUDMAN. I am pleased to yield for a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor, yielding to the Senator from North Carolina for a question.

Mr. HELMS. First of all, let me confess I have never tried a case in court. I am not a lawyer, and I am very proud of it most of the time.

Mr. RUDMAN. Sometimes, I say to my friend, being a lawyer does help around here.

Mr. HELMS. But not much. Is the Senator familiar with the 1951 decision Beuharnis versus Illinois?

Mr. RUDMAN. I read it some years ago, yes, I did.

Mr. HELMS. It has never been challenged, is that correct?

Mr. RUDMAN. I would not accept that. I would accept the 1973 Miller case as the landmark case. If the Senator wants to give me about 10 minutes to shephardize that case, I can answer the question, but I do not believe that case stands on all four squares today. No; that is my answer.

What particular holding in that case does the Senator believe still exists in light of the Miller case? Can you tell me that?

Mr. HELMS. Let me proceed a moment—and I thank the Senator for his remarks, and I thank him for the favorable things he said about my intent, but the Senator is addressing the first prong of my amendment and I am trying to address the third prong.

Now, as I understand it, and I think I am correct about this, because I have checked it carefully. Beuharnis claimed that an Illinois statute violated his right to free expression. The Supreme Court rejected his argument, and to this day that decision is the law of the land.

Now, the Illinois statute that the U.S. Supreme Court upheld in the Beuharnis case made it unlawful to display pictures or distribute information "which said publication or exhibition exposes the citizens of any race, color, creed, or religion to contempt, decision, or obloquy." My amendment does not prohibit material—just Federal funding for it—if it "denigrates, debases, or reviles a person, group, or class of citizens on the basis of race, creed, sex, handicap, age, or national origin." It should be apparent that the statute upheld in Beuharnis served as the model for the third prong of my amendment.

In rejecting Beuharnis' argument that the statute violated his first amendment right to free speech, Justice Frankfurther, for the Court, said, "There are limits to the exercise of these liberties of speech and press."

Mr. RUDMAN. That is a defamation case, Senator. I know what you are talking about. You cannot equate that with an obscenity case.

I suggest to the Senator, taking his language out again, that, if he wants to talk about defamation, that is one thing. That is not what paragraph 2 says, clearly. That is citing the wrong case for the wrong reason.

Mr. HELMS. Again, the Senator is addressing the first prong of my amendment. I was refuting the criticisms aimed at the third prong of the amendment.

As for the Miller case, the Supreme Court's holding in Regan v. Taxation with Representation (461 U.S. 650) makes it inapplicable to my amendment. The Supreme Court's strict definition of obscenity in the Miller case was only for first amendment purposes—that is, when the Government wishes to totally preempt publication or distribution of materials. But that is not what my amendment proposes to do. My amendment would still allow any and all materials to be produced or distributed, but not with Federal funds.

The holding in Regan was merely a reiteration of a long line of cases holding that Congress has the right to restrict the funds it dispenses from the Federal purse. In 1977, the Supreme Court stated that "Congress' decision not to subsidize the exercise of a fundamental right, such as free expression, does not infringe upon that [first amendment] right." As Justice Rhenquist stated in Regan, "Although the Government may not place obstacles in the path of a person's freedom of speech [like banning it], it need not remove those [obstacles] not of its own creation [like lack of funding]."

I yield the floor.

Mr. MOYNIHAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. RUDMAN. I have not yielded the floor as yet.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the Senator yield——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Excuse me, Senator.

Mr. RUDMAN. Let me just say to my good friend from North Carolina, I know how deeply disturbed he is personally by this exhibit, and I am, too. We are working very hard in this conference to set that correct.

I want to make an observation to my friend from North Carolina, that the history of the world is replete with good-intentioned people, putting limitations on the actions of others and getting totally unintended results.

If the Senator from North Carolina could draft provisions two and three in a way that was precise, I might support them. I am saying here tonight I do not believe that is possible.

I yield the floor.

Mr. MOYNIHAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, on the early evening of July 26, I rose to say—as I say now—"I rise in opposition," and I went through some remarks and said of the bill with its amendment, "Mr. President, I will vote no." I believe I was the only Member of the body to do so, and with that in mind I ask just a few moments to say why I did.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I will be happy to yield for a question. Will the distinguished Senator from Alaska say it is for a question?

Mr. STEVENS. I would be pleased to ask the question. Does the Senator from New York realize that Senator METZENBAUM, Senator CHAFEE, Senator COATS, Senator WIRTH, Senator JEFFORDS, as well as yourself, addressed the question that was before the Senate that night?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I said no other thing but that I would vote no. I believe you are making a personal matter of this which is not intended to be made.

Mr. STEVENS. No.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I yielded for a question. I answer that my statement said, "Mr. President, I will vote no." That is what I said.

I thought, sir, that at the time I was not trying to be too solemn about the subject of support for the arts, and I cited that lovely New York painter, John Sloan, who said, a half century ago in 1939, that "* * * it would be good to have a Ministry of Fine Art. Then we would know where the enemy is." That tension between government and the artist has been here with us as long as there has been government and artists is not in question. Indeed, this is nothing new.

Yet, how we address it on this occasion seems to me to say something about this time—our time—and it is a useful moment to reflect on it. I have been thinking about the descriptions of the crucifix. We are a body with many denominations, and at least two religions. In my religion, Roman Catholicism, the crucifixion always begins with the experience of the degradation of Christ. I repeat, the degradation of Christ. His clothes are gambled away. He is given vinegar. He is mocked. On the top of the cross, as it states in the Bible there is that mocking assertion in Latin, Iesus Nazarenus Rex ludaeorum, "Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews." Then follows death and the resurrection.

That is a deeply held tenent of one religion, and I can imagine many ways in which artists might choose to represent it. I do not speak to this particular representation in question, however. I have not seen it.

But, tonight, I asked for a Bible. Opening it, as chance would have, thinking I would be toward the end of the New Testament, I found myself in the Revelations of St. John the Divine. Chapter 17; exactly where this page fell open. Chapter 17 of Revelations.

And there came one of the seven angels which had the seven vials, and talked with me, saying unto me, Come hither; I will shew unto thee the judgment of the great whore that sitteth upon many waters:

Verse 2:

With whom the kings of the earth have committed fornication, and the inhabitants of the earth have been made drunk with the wine of her fornication.

Verse 3:

So he carried me away in the spirit into the wilderness: and I saw a woman sit upon a scarlet coloured beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns.

Verse 4:

And the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet colour, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication.

Verse 5, as the distinguished Presiding Officer who is a scholar of the text will remember:

And upon her forehead was a name written, "Mystery, Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots and Abominations of the Earth."

Mr. President, this is part of our civilization. How would one respond if scenes from the Bible were precluded by some government agency? Some might judge so; others not, certainly not those who wrote the text.

Mr. President, it is not just or primarily this thought which I address but, instead, to the wilder, indiscriminate proposition offered in this amendment, and to which the distinguished majority leader went right to the heart of.

Clause one speaks of indecent materials. What are indecent materials? Is this a society which goes about judging indecency? We do have, in fact, a court decision on obscenity, Miller, and there is a definition there, broad enough. But "indecency"—the court would never think of deciding what was decent or indecent.

We go a long way back with this. In those early remarks last July I invoked Milton and his great defense against censorship. He wrote,

As good almost kill a man as kills a good book: who kills a man kills a reasonable creature, God's image; but he who destroys a good book kills reason itself.

Have we not fought these matters long enough in the West to know we have come the judgment that let the public taste prevail; let the public sense prevail?

The first great judicial decision of its kind, I believe, came in 1933 when Judge Woolsey in the Southern District of New York decided a case under the Smoot-Hawley Tariff. Senator Smoot was a great man very much opposed to smut. I can remember a few lines from my youth somehow:

Senator Smoot, a Republican ut,
Is planning a ban on smut.
Rooty-toot-toot
For Smoot of ut
And his reverend occiput.

Under the Smoot-Hawley Tariff, James Joyce's "Ulysses" was kept out of this country. "Ulysses" is surely read in every high school. If there is a high school in the land which does not teach it they would not wish it known. It is an elementary, extraordinary book. But Woolsey said of it in 1933 that:

The words which are criticized as dirty are old saxon words known to almost all men and, I venture, to many women, and are such words as would be naturally and habitually used, I believe, by the types of folk whose life, physical and mental, Joyce is seeking to describe. In respect of the recurrent emergence of the theme of sex in the minds of his characters it must always be remembered that his locale was Celtic and his season spring.

Mr. President, as I read the amendment before us, the statement "that his locale was Celtic and his season spring" would clearly be in violation of article three and so we would have the question whether, if Judge Woolsey were about today would he too be in violation of it. I do not know. But I would hope the Senate would save itself embarrassment; save itself ridicule; save itself disparagement; and save itself disgrace by voting to table this amendment tonight.

Mr. President, I thank the Chair. I thank the Chamber, and I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alaska, Mr. STEVENS, is recognized.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I hate to get mundane and go back to the fact that the Senator from Hawaii and I are trying to manage a defense bill on the floor. And I would like to just briefly state to the Senate what has happened and urge the Senate to come back to dispose of this amendment.

It is the sense-of-the-Senate amendment that we should insist on an amendment that has already been passed and is in another bill in conference. At the end of the consideration of that bill, on July 26, the Senate as we usually do, insisted on our amendments and appointed conferees. I am one of those conferees.

Contrary to what my good friend from Colorado has said it was not in the dark of the night. I remember standing here on July 26 and looking at this amendment which was on the desk and wondering what the devil are we going to do with that when we get to conference and listening to my friend from West Virginia say, "the Senator has discussed the amendment with me, I am ready to accept it and take it to the conference."

How many of us in managing a bill have done that in order to get something in conference where we could work on it? It obviously was dealing with something that was a matter of great national concern and still is.

If you have not seen Mapplethorpe, I challenge you to go see his photographs. They are in there. If there is anyone of you that can say you would approve money for it then I would say without any hesitancy they should not be in the Senate. It is so obscene, totally so obscene that it never should have had a dollar spent from taxpayers' funds. That is not the question.

You cannot amend this amendment before us. It is a sense-of-the-Senate resolution that we should be instructed to do what we already have been instructed to do. When we first faced it I urged the distinguished majority leader to just let it go to a vote. It is a vote that is meaningless as stated by the Senator from West Virginia because we have already been instructed to uphold the Senate.

We have been working now I would say literally for a month at least trying to find a way to uphold the intent of the Senate as expressed by the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

I wonder who we are trying to kid that somehow or other those people speaking for or against the amendment that already passed by the Senate somehow could be affected here tonight.

Someone asked why do not we move to table the amendment which expresses the sense of the Senate that we should do what we are doing. I assume that would carry. It should not carry. We should just say, "OK, you want to reaffirm your position that you passed an amendment, pass it the same way."

The only thing I am sorry is my friend from North Carolina will not let it go without a RECORD vote. He has a right for a RECORD vote and he asked for a RECORD vote. I will just say this to the Senate, Mr. President, let us get back to the defense bill, and let us get back to it without this on another bill. You know, that is what you are liable to do if you start trying to bend this amendment.

I am perfectly willing, as a conferee, to try to work this out. We have tried. We are going to do it and we are going to bring back to the Senate something some of you may disagree with, but it will find a way to deny the use of taxpayers' money to exhibits like Mapplethorpe. I think that could be done.

As I told the Senator from North Carolina, I am sure that when I come back as one of the conferees with that amendment, he is going to disagree with it. I am prepared for that time.

But why should we stand here and argue about something that has already been passed and, with due respect to everybody, why can we not vote on our defense bill, Mr. President? I would like very much to vote on the defense bill.

I will tell you all just a strange circumstance. About 4 months ago, I was asked to have a call-in show for Alaska and Alaskans are sitting up there now—and it is 7 p.m.; it is 6 p.m. in Nome, I said, "OK, we will do it, but let us do it on Thursday. I know we will be in session, but we are bound to be out of session by 11:30."

And since I have paid $5,000 for an hour for a call-in show to Washington from Alaska that starts at 11:30, please vote by 11:30. Will you please? [Laughter.]

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, it is obvious that this issue is an important one and one which has generated a great deal of interest and debate.

To enable the managers and myself and the distinguished Republican leader to plan on how best to proceed, I wonder if I might inquire how many of the Senators feel the need to discuss this matter this evening.

Seven. I think there goes 11:30.

Could I inquire from each Senator what length of time they would intend to discuss this?

Senator WILSON?

Mr. WILSON. I should think 3 or 4 minutes would be adequate.

Mr. MITCHELL. Senator ARMSTRONG?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, if the leader would yield to me, I am uncertain as to how long I will take. I had not expected to speak on this issue. But, in fact, as I listened to the debate, I have been impressed by so much that has been said that I am called on to comment on it. So exactly how long I will take to speak will depend on how I feel when the moment comes and what might be said between now and then.

I have some reason to think I will be recognized first because I think I have been on my feet longer than any other Senator seeking recognition. So if I am not provoked further, I might not speak very long. [Laughter.]

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I hope the Senator does not regard my inquiry as a provocation.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If the leader will yield further, I certainly do not regard it as such. But I must say that what some Senators have said here tonight was fraught with so many strawmen that strawmen could be erected and stacked around this Chamber. It is truly extraordinary.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator does not need to place a time limit on the length of time he intends to speak. He will have, obviously, plenty of time to debate this subject.

Senator CRANSTON?

Mr. CRANSTON. Two minutes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Senator CHAFEE?

Mr. CHAFEE. If I could have 3 minutes. I think I was ahead of Senator ARMSTRONG, but I think I better go after Senator ARMSTRONG. We do not want to encourage him too much here.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not intending to cut anybody off or to suggest anybody speak less than they would like. I am merely trying to get an idea of what is in store for us, either this evening or tomorrow, to enable me to make a judgment on how much further we ought to pursue this matter.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I say to the Senator from Colorado that a lot of us have been here since the beginning of this debate, over an hour and a half ago, seeking recognition, not only myself, but the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from California. We have been here the whole time. We are glad he joined in.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If the Senator will yield, if I was mistaken about this, I would be glad to speak at any moment. But at the exact time when the leader, who now has the floor, was seeking recognition, there was only one other Senator on his feet seeking recognition, and I was that Senator, I believe. But I am not trying to get ahead of the Senator from Georgia or anybody else.

As I said at the outset, I did not intend to speak in the first place. But I do intend to now.

Mr. FOWLER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I guess in answer to the leader's question, I do not want to make a speech, but I would like to direct some questions to the author of the amendment, which has not been possible during this whole hour and a half of debate, to try to clarify the language and the intent of his amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. Senator METZENBAUM?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Five minutes.

I would say, Mr. President, I think everybody's mind has been made up. My guess is that if other Senators would be willing to give up their time, this Senator would be willing to give up his time. I am just trying to give some suggestion to some others.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is very kind, but you have already spoken.

Mr. METZENBAUM. No, I have not. I have been on my feet a number of times, but I have not spoken this evening.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is so late, I am confusing this with other issues. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I think we have another question. If we are going to spend another hour on this, is it necessary that we do it tonight? Why not do it tomorrow morning? It is 11 o'clock at night.

It seems to me we ought to go home. If you want to get consent on the next bill, I am not going to stay here all night and get consent for 9 o'clock in the morning to start on the State, Justice, Commerce bill.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote.

Mr. DOLE. We ought to vote. If Senators would go look at the pictures, they would all vote not to table and we would be out of here.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, let me say that, in fairness to those who have not spoken, it is simply not fair to say that Senators who have spoken somehow have some priority over those who have not. The hallmark of this institution is fairness to all. If a Senator feels it is important enough that he wants to speak, he or she ought to have the opportunity to do so.

The reason I asked the question was to determine whether we ought to go on this evening.

We have at least seven Senators who expressed an interest in speaking and no absolute limit on the length of time. It seems to me prudence indicates that we are better off doing this in the morning.

What I would like to suggest is that we now get an agreement on an aggregate amount of time for tomorrow, equally divided, so that we do not have a repeat of this tomorrow, and Senators who wish to speak can be here present and seeking recognition. In that way we will be able to complete action on this.

Mr. STEVENS. Reserving the right to object, if the Senator made a request. We do have an agreement. There are no more amendments.

(Mr. BRYAN assumed the Chair.)

Mr. MITCHELL. I am talking about a time limitation on the remaining debate on this amendment, so that we could do this in a way that does not deprive any Senator who has not yet had the chance to speak from doing so.

As I look at the list here, it looks like about half or better would be in opposition to the amendment and a number of speakers, better than half in time, in support of the amendment.

May I suggest to my colleagues who want to speak that we agree to 2 hours of debate in the morning, equally divided, on the issue. That would give each side an hour and would enable us to vote by a time certain and dispose of this matter and then, hopefully, do the State, Commerce, Justice bill.

I think the minority leader is quite correct. I just do not see the point of going on now for maybe an unlimited time. As we all know from past experience, people tend to speak longer late than they do early.

If no Senator expresses any intention to object, I will propound that request.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, just for myself, I would be willing to give up my time. I spoke to the Senator from California, the Senator from Ohio, and all Senators on our side who stood. If we get an agreement with the other side, we are perfectly willing to vote this evening, right now, with no further debate on our side if our colleagues on the other side agree. We have had an exceptionally good debate, I must say, on all sides.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, if the leader will yield to me, I am not disposed to agree to his request. I think this is one occasion where horsing around trying to get a time agreement will lengthen rather than shorten the process. For my own part, had I been speaking, I would have been done by now.

I do not expect to speak at any great length, but I am not prepared at this moment to enter into a time agreement on the length of my remarks or on the remarks of other Senators. I do not care whether we do it tonight, early tomorrow, or late tomorrow, or when. Everybody should have a chance to make their statement. The Senator has correctly stated that fairness to everybody is the hallmark of this body.

May I point out that fairness is the hallmark of the majority leader. I am grateful to him for making that point. It would be very easy for the leader to say well, we have had a good debate, a lot of people have talked. This is true. But the leader correctly stated not everyone who wishes to speak has had an opportunity to do so and I respect the understanding of the majority leader.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, it seems most of those who wanted to speak were in opposition to the amendment. The Senator from Colorado was one of the few who were in favor of the amendment.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. How does the Senator know my proposition? I have not stated it.

Mr. CHAFEE. Well, I took a chance and guessed.

It seems to me, thus, you have a good share of that hour that the leader suggested be an hour on each side.

Would an hour not satisfy my colleague?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, if whoever has the floor would wish to yield, I am not prepared to enter into a line agreement. I am perfectly glad to have those who wish to stay do so and have a vote for tomorrow. If the Senator from Ohio does not wish to stay and hear whether he is correct in his surmise on the Senator's position on the matter, that is fine with me. I am going to say my piece. It will not be too long but if it is too long for Senators who want to go home, that is fine with me.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator from Colorado agree for a specific time for the vote?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. No; Mr. President, I will not. I would be willing to agree to a time for the vote tomorrow if we can continue to stay tonight. That would permit those wishing to leave to do so.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would the Senator agree to that if the Senator may speak as long as he wishes?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. My thought would be any Senators wishing to speak tonight. If the leader wants to get a time for a vote tomorrow, permitting others to speak tonight, that would be fine for me. I am not wishing to hold anybody in the Chamber.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, then what I will suggest to my colleagues is that tomorrow morning we have 1 hour of debate on this subject, equally divided, with a vote set at a time certain.

Then, tonight, any Senator who wishes to do so may address the subject for as long as he or she wishes to do so.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I will be here. Since my night has been spoiled, I will be here all night long. I want to get this out of the way.

Mr. HELMS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, it depends on whether we continue this rediculous charade of crying censorship, that the amendment is going to ban the Bible and all that. I have to be sure I have some time to answer this foolishness.

I suggest that a minimum of 2 hours tomorrow, and whatever time Senators want to spend tonight, I will be here.

I will say to the leader, I was prepared to vote without any debate tonight. All I wanted was for the Senators to look at the pictures and then vote as they please and then answer to the people back home. That is all I was saying.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the Senator.

Then the obvious only alternative available is to permit continuation of the debate this evening for as long as Senators wish to debate, to have 2 hours equally divided in the morning. I would suggest that we begin at 8:30 in the morning on the bill and vote at 10:30, and that then we will attempt to complete the State, Justice, Commerce if we can do so tomorrow at that time. Does any Senator here object to that before I propound the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I wonder if the majority leader would yield for one moment for a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair?

Mr. President, my inquiry is this. Does the unanimous-consent agreement controlling the second-degree amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina preclude, before final action is taken on this measure, a motion to recommit the amendment, instructing that items 2 and 3, or paragraphs 2 and 3 be excluded from instructions to the conferees?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In response to the question of the Senator from Arkansas, that would require a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I am wondering if the Senator from North Carolina would consider such?

Mr. HELMS. Not one bit.

Mr. PRYOR. I did not think he would, but I was just trying to find a way out of this thicket. I thank the Senator.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT REQUEST

Mr. MITCHELL. Accordingly, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business this evening it stand in recess until 8:30 a.m., on tomorrow; that there be 2 hours of debate tomorrow on the pending amendment with a vote on or in relation to the amendment at the conclusion of or yielding back of that time; the time to be controlled by the distinguished Senator from North Carolina and the distinguished Senator from Hawaii, or their designees; and that the time for the majority and minority leaders be deferred until later in the day.

I can state before the Chair acts on this request, it would be my intention, as stated in my discussion with the Senator from Colorado, that the debate would continue this evening until such time as any Senator who wished to address the Senate on the subject has the opportunity to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Reserving the right to object, the Senator from New Mexico may not be available if the yielding back in the morning occurs at 9. That might occur under the unanimous-consent request of the majority leader. Could it be we will not vote before 10, even if time is yielded back?

Mr. MITCHELL. If that would accommodate the Senator, I will be pleased to do so. My expectation is there will be plenty of debate tomorrow morning as well.

Mr. DOMENICI. I understood that, but the majority leader also said "unless yielded back."

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I modify my request to ask that, if the time is yielded back, that the vote in any event not occur prior to 10 a.m.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the leader.

Mr. HELMS. Reserving the right to object, I have a confession to make, Mr. Leader. My 17-month-old granddaughter is visiting me and I want to feed her breakfast. Could we start at 9?

Mr. MITCHELL. Would the Senator be willing to cut it to an hour and half then, so we can complete?

Mr. HELMS. No. I mean here we are at 11:19.

We have family life. I do not have much family with me up here but I do have a granddaughter up here visiting me. If the majority leader will make it 9 he will have himself a deal.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would say to the Senator from North Carolina I have tried very hard to do this in a manner that is fair to everyone. I do not want to infringe upon his time with his granddaughter. But is it not possible? The Senator does not have to be here during the first half hour of debate. Perhaps it would be persons that have stated things that have otherwise been said.

Mr. HELMS. Why must we start at 8:30?

Mr. MITCHELL. Because we hoped to finish this bill at 6 this evening. What is sacrosanct is I tried to do it in 1 hour and it is the Senator who insisted on doing it in 2 hours. We also have the State, Justice, Commerce bill.

Mr. HELMS. I was ready to vote when you were clustered with all your colleagues at the well trying to find a way to circumvent this amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator is incorrect in stating what my intention was.

Mr. HELMS. I can hear. The House did circumvent a vote on the amendment when many Members of the House wanted to vote.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from North Carolina knows a lot of things, but there is one thing he does not know: What is in my mind. He was characterizing my intentions.

Mr. HELMS. I did not mean to imply that I knew what was in the mind of the Senator.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I hope we can get this done in a way that will complete action. We have already wasted—not wasted, but used up a substantial amount of time just trying to move this matter forward. I attempted to accommodate every request by every Senator. It is just very difficult to do.

Mr. INOUYE. If my leader will yield, we have alredy gotten the unanimous consent to go to a third reading and final passage of this measure; with no amendments thereafter.

That being the case, I would like to advise the leadership that I would be willing to sit here all night long and finish this. I think most of us are here.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator agree then to have 3 hours with 1½ hours of it this evening and 1½ hours tomorrow morning, and anybody can say anything they want for as long as they want, including the Senator? Then those who wish to remain for that portion of the debate this evening could do so. Those who wish to may remain and participate in that portion of the debate in the morning, can do so. We have already had a couple hours; 3 more hours is fair to everyone. We will start at 9 and vote at 10:30.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I have the floor. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. President Bush is going to South Carolina in the morning on the disaster matter, and I am getting up at 4 and leaving at 5 o'clock in the morning. I just am wondering if these votes can be put off until say 11 o'clock or 11:30, or could you stack the votes? Senator HOLLINGS and I feel compelled to go. You can understand.

Mr. MITCHELL. We certainly understand that.

Mr. THURMOND. If you stack the votes, I was hoping maybe we could do that.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Let us vote tonight.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is impossible with so many conflicting demands to accommodate everybody. I apologize. It is simply impossible. We have 100 Senators, each of whom insistently insist that the operations of the Senate be conducted in a manner to accommodate his or her schedule interests. It is understandable. It is human nature. The Senator from South Carolina has been among the least.

Mr. THURMOND. If it is going to go beyond that, if it can be stacked. I do not ask you to hold up and wait.

Mr. MITCHELL. We will do the best we can.

Mr. HELMS. If you will accede to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, I will take the proposition of an hour and a half tonight, and tomorrow morning.

Mr. MITCHELL. Can I get consent to go to the State, Justice, Commerce bill as soon as we finish debate, so we do not have 3 or 4 hours consumed by this?

Mr. HELMS. I do not think I can comment on that. That will be up to our leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. He has asked only that the vote be stacked at a time in the future. If we cannot go to State, Justice, Commerce, then there is nothing to stack. I wonder if the distinguished Republican leader is here.

Mr. HELMS. I will see if he is.

Mr. MITCHELL. So we can go to that, and then stack the vote to accommodate the Senator from South Carolina but permit us to proceed with the other business.

Mr. DOLE. Would that be the only business we take up tomorrow, then?

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not know that. I want to discuss that further with the distinguished Republican leader.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I would object to the first vote and the second. We are willing to vote tonight and vote first thing tomorrow morning. I would object to any hiatus arrangement. Let us vote tonight.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand the Senator's frustration, and we are all very tired and frustrated. We have to try to move the business of the Senate forward, impossible as that frequently seems. I hope the Senator would defer.

If we can amend the unanimous-consent request to say that the debate on this matter will be 1½ hours this evening equally divided, 1½ hours between the hours of 9 and 10:30 tomorrow and at 10:30 we will go to the State, Justice, Commerce bill. The Senator from Sorth Carolina says he will be back at 11.

Mr. THURMOND. I think we will get back about 11:30, actually.

Mr. MITCHELL. At 11:30, we will interrupt the State, Justice, Commerce bill to vote on this amendment and then this bill, and then return to State, Justice, Commerce and hopefully complete action on that shortly thereafter.

I know the Senator is frustrated. We all are. That will accommodate still another Senator's interest.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If the leader will yield, it seems to me, for reasons we previously discussed, there is no need to put a limit on the time for debate this evening. The limit you suggest for tomorrow accomplishes his purposes, but to limit the debate tonight is unduly restrictive.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have the health and interests of the managers in mind.

Mr. INOUYE. I will stay all night long.

Mr. MITCHELL. I modify my request to place no limit on the length of the debate tonight.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I thank the leader. Let me assure him and other Senators, I do not expect to speak at length.

Mr. HATFIELD. Will the leader yield for a question? I did not quite understand when we would finish the Defense appropriations bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. We would complete all action, other than the actual votes, at 10:30 a.m., and we would stack the votes until 11:30 to accommodate the Senator from South Carolina, so the votes would occur, and I understand the votes to be on or in relation to the Helms amendment, and then final passage at 11:30.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HATFIELD. One further question on that. Does that wrap the unanimous-consent agreement on my technical amendment?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. Yours does not require a rollcall vote.

Mr. HATFIELD. No, it will not require a rollcall vote.

Mr. DOLE. Will the majority leader yield? Since I am the one who raised it about staying here tonight, I might just make one suggestion. Maybe if we could just hear the Senator from Colorado, and if the Senator from North Carolina wants any rebuttal, because most of the time has been consumed by those who are against the amendment, then we might get a vote here in the next few moments.

If everybody else desists, we can wrap this up in about 30 minutes and then would not have that problem in the morning. Then we could give consent on State, Justice, and Commerce. I understand there would be no conference report on legislative appropriations.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is not my intention to proceed to the legislative conference report tomorrow. It is not my intention.

Mr. DOLE. Does anybody else feel they have to speak other than the Senator from Colorado, who has been waiting?

Mr. DECONCINI. How long does the Senator from Colorado propose to speak?

Mr. MITCHELL. He will not say.

Mr. INOUYE. I will stay here all night long.

Mr. DOLE. We might have disposition of this, and you can sleep a little longer in the morning.

Mr. MITCHELL. Let us try it and hope that the Senator from Colorado can be as concise as his point permits him to be, and then as soon as he finishes——

Mr. CHAFEE. I was hoping I could speak for 3 minutes. After hearing this, I may give up.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think the Senator should be permitted to speak for 3 minutes. There is no limit on him. Let us go ahead and see if we can do it. We will yield to the Senator from Colorado and hope we can be out of here in a reasonably short time.

Mr. ARMSTRONG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request for the unanimous-consent agreement is withdrawn, if the Chair correctly understands the majority leader's position?

Mr. MITCHELL. I withdraw my unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I do want to speak about the bill. Then I want to say a word about the process we have just been through. I have two observations. First, I want to say we have really wasted time. This is not an uncommon practice, but it seems to me that more often than not, going the extra mile to seek a unanimous-consent agreement ends up wasting more time than it saves.

That is a judgment call, and every Senator has their own opinion. I, for one, think that the majority leader has really been gracious, not only tonight, but night after night, in trying to accommodate the desires of Senators. I am appreciative of him trying to do it.

But I have long believed, not just for a month or this year, but for years and years, that the better course of action would be to seek fewer unanimous-consent agreements, spend less time wrangling over who is going to speak in what order and what amendment we would call up and when we would vote, and just go ahead and let Senators stand up and speak if they were in the Chamber seeking recognition, let them offer amendments if that is their desire, and go from there.

Mr. President, I have noticed through the course of this evening's debate Senator after Senator has come to the floor to declare their wholehearted agreement with the idea, the underlying concept of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. I agree with the Senator from North Carolina; speaker after speaker has said it in so many words or substance. One of them said I sympathize with the Senator from North Carolina. Senator after Senator has gone out of his way to associate himself with the underlying idea of Senator Helms' amendment and yet has found some reason, some excuse, some premise, some incremental value which prevents the Senators from voting for this amendment.

There is a serious double standard here, Mr. President, because we do not ordinarily subject an amendment or a piece of legislation to that kind of analysis unless deep down inside we really are not very sympathetic to the amendment after all.

Mr. President, as I think about this issue about which I did not intend to speak, I recall a jury trial I heard of one time which was gory and distasteful and the details of it were shocking to the conscience of the community. The jurors sat day after day, week after week, for a very long period of time, listening to the case put on by the prosecution, and it was really pretty awful stuff. Then the defense got up and put on its case and that also went on for several days. They had finally sat there for several weeks listening to the presentation of evidence and then the closing arguments, and then they listened to the judge, who took quite a long time to give his instructions to the jury.

Presently, Mr. President, the jury retired to the jury room for their deliberations and returned in 5 minutes. The judge turned to the foreman of the jury, and he said, "Can it be, Mr. Foreman, that you have arrived at a conclusion?" The foreman said, "Yes, Your Honor, we have. We have decided we don't want to get mixed up in this thing."

That is exactly how I feel. This is not a subject which so far as I can remember I have ever addressed publicly before, and I am not eager to do so now. It is distasteful to me in the extreme. But, Mr. President, it is also distasteful to me to leave unanswered the arguments which have been presented in this Chamber tonight. I said a moment ago that I had seen a lot of straw men erected in this Chamber but never so many, I think, as through the course of this evening.

Mr. President, the arguments which have been presented here tonight in my view, and I say this cautiously because I have the greatest respect for any colleagues, simply do not hold water. They are excuses, they are excuses for people who do not, regardless of what they may have said, support the main idea of the Senator's amendment.

There may be exceptions to this, and I recognize that it is not up to me to judge what is in somebody's heart, but, Mr. President, let us not be bamboozled. The arguments that have been presented against this argument, frankly, do not make a lot of sense. We have been told this is a great first amendment issue. In my view that is utter nonsense. This is not a first amendment issue. This is a question of what we are going to buy and pay for. Nobody is saying whether or not some artist, real or imagined, shall be permitted to paint a certain kind of painting or take a certain kind of photograph or even to desecrate the objects of religious faith.

That is not the issue in the amendment presented by our colleague from North Carolina [Mr. HELMS]. The question is whether or not the Federal Government ought to pay for it. My answer to that is, no.

Senators can dance all around that issue, and they can find every excuse under the Sun to get into whatever position they want but that is the question. I do not think in their hearts there are very many in this Chamber who see it very much differently than that. Maybe I am wrong. Maybe when I get up in the morning I will see it differently myself, but I do not think so. Out home I doubt very much if there are very many people who will be taken in, fooled or confused by the straw men in this Chamber tonight. This is not a first amendment issue.

Somebody said that under this amendment NEA would not have been able to fund Huckleberry Finn. Mr. President, I do not know whether that is true or not, but the reason that was given specifically why Huckleberry Finn could not be funded is because it contained a racially offensive remark.

Honest to Pete, Mr. President, I do not know why the National Endowment for the Arts or anybody else using taxpayers' money should fund that kind of a remark.

Now, that is not a judgment on Mark Twain. It is not a judgment on Huckleberry Finn. I do not think, as one of my colleagues remarked earlier, that the Federal Government ought to buy the paint that Huckleberry Finn used to paint the fence or the raft that he used to sail down the river, but I am absolutely convinced that we should not fund a racially offensive remark. I am dumbfounded to think that somebody would suggest that that would be an appropriate course of action.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. No, because I discovered a long time ago that the Senator from Georgia is so skilled in debate that if I were to yield at this point for a question he might embarrass me, and I do not want that to happen.

Mr. FOWLER. The Senator is correct, and I will withdraw the request.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I think at this point, I would prefer to try to state my own argument and then I will be happy to yield later if someone wants me to do so.

Second, Mr. President, we have been treated to the explanation that voting for the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina would somehow constitute censorship.

That is so obviously false that it is hard to know how to address it. We are not prohibiting anybody from doing anything, even from the production, even from the exhibition of the objects of so-called objects of art which every Senator, I think, who has discussed them has said are revolting, are barbaric, or art for twisted minds, as, I think, one of our colleagues characterized them. What we are talking about is only whether or not the taxpayers ought to pay for such production and exhibition.

Well, it is a very difficult decision to make, we are told. One of the most distinguished Members of this body who has made, I believe, the most eloquent statement on this subject tonight made the point that picking suitable art is a very difficult task. I agree with that. Mr. President, it is very difficult. Trying to decide what art is worthy and what is not is a task which requires great judgment, great discernment, great understanding, a capacity to evaluate objects of art that really requires a high order of understanding of art. Picking suitable art is difficult but, Mr. President, somebody is going to do that. In every case, somebody will make that decision because we have an absolutely unlimited demand for free Federal money and really by comparison only a tiny amount of such funding available to subsidize the works of art which would seek such support. That is just a fact. Somebody is going to make the decision, and we are not going to fund half of the projects that come before the Federal Government in one way or another for funding. We are not going to fund 5 percent. We are probably not going to fund 10 percent.

The fact is, if we appropriated maybe 100 times as much as we are going to appropriate now or in the future in support of the arts, we still could not fulfill the demand. Somebody is going to have to make these decisions.

The question is not whether or not the Senate should make those decisions. Obviously, we are not going to decide on a case-by-case basis. The question is whether or not we should express to those to whom we have delegated the responsibility for making this decision some notion of standards.

One of the Senators who has spoken tonight suggests that to hold up a standard of decency is inappropriate because courts have found that difficult to define. Mr. President, that reveals an attitude of mind that is very different from my own. It reveals an attitude that says anything which is not legally obscene ought to be therefore at least eligible for funding. I do not feel that way. I feel there is an enormous amount of worthy art, worthy literature, a tiny amount of funding available, and we do not have to see how close we can come to the line funding indecent or obscene works of art.

There is a lot of art, and you know the people who want to see how close they can come to the line or even want to step over the line are not limited to doing this with Federal funds. They would do this with their own money or with many of the private foundations that are in that business. The question is what is the Federal Government going to pay for?

Mr. President, it has been said that the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina goes too far, that in effect it is a good idea, we are sympathetic to it, none of us likes this kind of trash, that it is art for twisted minds, that this is overly broad, and it is too vague. That may be. I am not sure of that. I do not find it hard to understand. I do not find it vague particularly.

But if somebody thinks that, let them come forward with something that is better. I am ready to listen to that.

I think that the Senator from North Carolina and the sponsors of this amendment are ready to listen to a proposal. But to simply say this is no good, we agree with you, this is not going to get the job done. It does not seem to me that is the quality of legislation. If somebody has a better idea, let us hear it. I am not a sponsor of this amendment. I am not obligated to vote for the amendment. If somebody has a better idea, I am ready to hear it.

Mr. President, one of the things that we have heard tonight is about this issue of the extreme difficulty of definition and how hard it is for us to really know where that line is drawn. I want to emphasize that I do not think that is a question of going back and agonizing over somebody's interpretation of court decisions.

You know, we do not have any notion of such a standard in the other kinds of legislation which we write when we write legislation relating to air pollution, or national defense, or housing, or agriculture. We just do not do it that way. We set forth in the statute in terms that reasonable people can understand the benchmarks and the guidelines. But with respect to the Agriculture Department and the Defense Department or the Department of Housing and Urban Development, and HHS and the others, to administer programs and where there is a close call of somebody, not necessarily a Senator but a citizen, defense contractor, farmer, or whoever it is, environmental interest, thinks there is a term that needs to be defined, they can take it to court. It gets defined. But we do not try to agonize over that there.

If we did, we would never get any business done. We use words commonly understood by people in everyday conversation.

It seems to me to try to hold this amendment to a different standard is simply an attempt to find an excuse for voting against it.

Mr. President, I guess the bedrock question that has not really been asked but I would like to ask Senators to think about it is what difference does it make anyway? Does a dirty picture matter? This is almost the 21st century, late in the 20th century. We are men and women of the world, sophisticated people. Do dirty pictures make any difference?

A lot of people do not think so. As a matter of fact, today it is quite common to see on television in the popular media things that would have been shocking a generation ago. Our sons and daughters work in retail stores where they sell the kind of things which are euphemistically termed "softcore," things that they would have been arrested for possessing a generation ago, 20, 25 years ago, and which police officers spent a fair amount of their time suppressing a generation ago. Today we take them for granted.

In fact, as I pointed out a moment ago, our sons and daughters, if they want to work in certain kinds of retail establishments, have to not only agree to be around those things but actually have to have commerce in them. Does it make any difference? I am convinced it does.

I have spent some time reading the history of such things, and it appears to me very clearly that pornography—that is what we are talking about here, and I did not say obscenity. I am not trying to get into the question of where the lines between what is indecent and what may be pornographic, but not legally obscene, lies. I am not trying to hinder that debate at all. But it is pornography, much of it, and part of what we are talking about here tonight is pornography. It is dirty pictures, and things that corrupt the human mentality.

When we honor that, when we permit it, when we pretend it does not matter, when we allow it to be sold in our stores, when we, heaven forbid, require Federal Government funds be expended for such projects we are degrading ourselves. We are degrading our families, and we are degrading our communities.

I do not know how many Senators are aware of the television program about the man who was executed a few months ago in Florida after committing many heinous murders. But he made a very interesting interview with a journalist telling what prompted him to get into this life of heinous crimes and multiple murders.

In essence, I do not want to be guilty of oversimplifying but he blamed it on pornography. He said it obsessed him. I do not know whether that is true, but that is what he said less than 24 hours before he was executed in the Florida penitentiary. Others have given similar testimony. I do not know if they are right. I am sure not an authority on this.

I will never forget what one person told me much to my surprise, a man whose name would be known instantly to many of us in the room. I will not identify him because he has not chosen to identify himself publicly. But he is a man who has held positions of responsibility in the Government. In fact, he is a fine public servant.

He confided to a group of us on one occasion that he himself had been obsessed by pornography for a number of years, and that he had managed to escape this obsession, but that for 9 years he had been in the grip of it.

I am convinced dirty pictures do make a difference. I am convinced that what the Senate is willing to tolerate, what standard we set not in terms of censoring what someone may wish to do, not in terms of trying to settle tonight what is protected by the first amendment but just in terms of what we want to pay for, in terms of what we want to put our stamp of approval on, does make a difference. That is why, unless somebody has a better idea or a better amendment, I intend to support the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. CHAFEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island is recognized.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I briefly want to make a couple of comments since I was one of the few here on July 26 who spoke against the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina at that time.

It seems to me this is a totally unnecessary firestorm we are going through here this evening. The National Endowment for the Arts has been in existence for 25 years. It has funded 85,000 different projects, and of those a total of 25 have been brought into question. That is a pretty darned good record.

The problem is not with the first amendment or anything like that. It is just that this action we are taking if supported tonight is going to cast a pall, is going to cast a chill over all exhibits in the future. Is this exhibit going to meet the standards as set forth by the Senate in this amendment? You have an exhibit that shows Hitler as a wicked man, a pathological liar. Now, is that all right? Let us look at No. 3. That is denigrating him on the basis of a handicap saying that he is a pathological liar.

That is a violation. What nonsense. What is going to happen in the exhibits? We have decided here that it is legitimate for the Government to fund some of these exhibits to encourage the arts in the Nation.

What is going to happen is those who put on the exhibits, if this should be adopted, will only feel that they should have safe exhibits, those that reach the lowest common denominator.

I do not think that is what we want in our Nation. Come on. We can do better than that. Eighty-five thousand exhibits, and only twenty-five have been questionable.

So there is no need for this amendment. I think we ought to let the fires of imagination and originality in the Nation burn. There is liable to be some singeing. Yes. There is. There are going to be some mistakes. But it seems to me that is a risk well worth taking, taking to encourage the flames of genius that we hope exist in this country.

I want to thank the Chair.

Mr. FOWLER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I see the Senator from North Carolina is on the floor, the author of the amendment.

I wonder if he would allow me to ask him a couple of clarifying questions.

Mr. HELMS. If the Senator will come over here and look at these photographs, and tell me that he has any question about the amendment, then I will consider being grilled by him. The Senator may not cross examine another Senator.

Mr. FOWLER. The Senator from Georgia has seen the pictures. I have a question about the amendment.

Mr. HELMS. I do not wish to engage in any debate with the Senator, it is late. If he will make his statement, I will make mine.

Mr. FOWLER. I simply want to ask about the Senator's own words in his amendment in order to find out the legislative intent. I thought that was the purpose of our body, to seek clarification and do the best job we can so we know what language we are voting on.

Mr. HELMS. I say to the Senator that the amendment has been nitpicked for almost 2 months and I am not going to contribute to having it nitpicked further.

Mr. FOWLER. I say to my friend from North Carolina, in all sincerity, and I say it—I preface by agreeing with the Senator from North Carolina in his paragraph No. 1, that what he has attempted to do is to prohibit material, photographs, so-called art that is deeply offensive to the spirit and to the dehumanization of man. And for that effort, he has my support. But if the Senator would reply, I am concerned, as I think every thoughtful Christian would be concerned, by the language of his amendment in article two and article three, which I submit is unnecessary to the attempt to get rid of smut, which we all share. But I also raise some questions about Christianity and Judaism and the faith of Americans that I do not believe the Senator from North Carolina would want to violate. For instance, the language of the Senator's amendment says, and I specifically quote, "No funds may be used to promote, disseminate or produce material which denigrates the objects or beliefs of the adherents of a particular religion or nonreligion." Would not the Senator admit that the Holy Scripture itself, that the words of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount, in all of the Gospels, Mathew, Mark, Luke, and John, depictions in this Bible, in any written work, much less 700 years of Christian art, can be conceived as being offensive to Jews, who are being asked to follow a man that we as Christians believe is the Son of God, but their faith, Judaism, denies that special status.

Would not the Senator, who knows this Bible, know that when Jews deny that Jesus is the Son of God, the absolute rock on which all Christian faith is founded, that that denial by Jews, throughout all of the literature in our libraries, funded by public moneys, depicted in religious films, depicted in art, that that denial by Jews is deeply offensive in the words of the Senator's amendment to the particular religion of Christianity? I implore the Senator to think on those things, because I know he is a Christian and would not deliberately do offense to the Senator from Utah, who happens to be a professing and believing Mormon, the Jewish Members of this body, as well as those of us, who try—though, Lord, we fail—to practice the precepts of the Gospel in our public service. Eight hundred, 900 years of art and of literature is literally covered by the Senator's amendment, paragraph No. 2.

Others have spoken tonight far more eloquently than I. The Senator from Missouri, the Senator from New Hampshire, the Senator from Washington, about the last clause, section 3; and I will not try to cite book, except to say that language can be written to cover pornography and obscenity, but when we get into these areas, exploitation of children, what about the great Titian depiction of Herod slaughtering the first born? Is that not a depiction of exploitation of children? Why did Sampson, blinded, pull down the temple on his head? Is that not self-masochism, a man who believed his faith so strongly that he would kill himself by pulling down the temple.

We cannot let some bureaucrat decide these questions, because these questions, which are as deeply rooted and as old as all of our faiths, are not necessary to reach the intent of the Senator's amendment. I ask the Senator—I do not want to prolong this. We can use example after example after example. But the Senator from Colorado is right, these words may be, in a lawyer's sense, vague and imprecise and may be ambiguous legal meanings, but they are clear to anyone not a lawyer who reads them. If we vote this amendment Nos. 2 and 3, we cannot disseminate any material which offends the beliefs of any religion, or nonreligion—I will not even get into that. Jesus said, "Go you therefore into all the world, teach the Gospel, baptize. Go then in the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost." What do you think that does to secular humanism, the great nonreligion that you and I and the Senator from North Carolina have tried to put aside? If that is not offensive to them, the word of Jesus, I do not know what is.

Mr. COATS. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. COATS. Does not the Senator's argument about the dissemination of religious material—Is the Senator for elimination of the funding of any material, whether it is promotion of Christian religion or Jewish religion, does he not argue for the examination of the separation of church and state clause of the first amendment? Perhaps we should not be utilizing or sending funds to the National Endowment for the Arts for this purpose at all.

It seems to me the argument is an eloquent one for eliminating all funding for the National Endowment for the Arts because it is promoting some religion. We would avoid any question of censorship, any question of Government involvement in any of this altogether, if we were not putting forth funds for these purposes. I am asking a question.

Mr. FOWLER. I say to the question, that would not be my interpretation because that is not what the words say. Quite the contrary, and I apologize to the body. I want to conclude but I will be glad to discuss it. Quite the contrary. What I wanted to ask the Senator from Colorado, but he would not yield, in being offended by Huckleberry Finn and stopping just short of advocating no funding for a library that had Huckleberry Finn, that is what you get into.

The question down the road if we adopt this amendment is whether or not we are going to fund libraries that have any literature that is covered under this act. The question down the road is whether or not we repeal the charitable deductions of taxpayers who give to their religion in order to disseminate, produce, and promote their religion which happen to be offensive to the nonreligion. That is where the public policy leads.

All of you forgive me for sounding like I am preaching. I am not trying to do that. I am just trying to say as we said 2 hours ago there is a very easy way to deal with this and accomplish, I submit, the complete purposes of the Senator from North Carolina and that is to voluntarily delete sections 2 and 3 that covers areas totally extraneous to obscenity or pornography and art.

We can adopt the strong language minus the word if you would, "indecent" because that has been the subject of all sorts of interpretations by the Supreme Court, and what the U.S. Senate would say is "No public money shall be authorized to promote, disseminate, or produce obscene materials, any obscene materials, including but not limited to depictions of sado-masochism, homoeroticism, the exploitation of children or individuals engaged in sex acts." What could be stronger or more explicit to tell the country no money for that, tell the bureaucrats you are gone if you do that, tell the NEA that you have to get back in touch with the American people, our values; we are not going to tolerate this?

I do not know how this thing got here. I honestly do not know how this thing got here. There are 1 million artists every year that produce in this country. A lot of them paint trash like these two guys. But you know what usually happens, it does not get seen. If 1 million people paint in this country, they all go on their hands and their knees to a gallery and museum and say "Please show our stuff." The galleries, because of space, turn away 99 percent of it. But if there is going to be the judgment, it has to be at the gallery level.

And I agree with the Senator from North Carolina that if we adopt section 1 of his amendment, we will let every gallery that has any public funds know that if they cannot use better judgment than they used in these two cases you are going to have a lot of people say no money. But that will do the job, my friends. That will do the job and not open the doors, pitting religion against religion, getting into this whole area of creed, or national origin where we had 2,000 years of recorded history and literature which we would not or could not overturn in this body.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, will the Senate yield?

Mr. FOWLER. I yield.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me first?

Mr. FOWLER. I am glad to yield.

Mr. DOLE. I do not see the majority leader. I wonder if we could agree to vote at 12:30. I renew the objection I made at 11 o'clock.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Georgia wants to move——

Mr. DOLE. We are going to have two speakers on this side. Can we vote?

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote right now.

Mr. HELMS. Five minutes.

Mr. DOLE. Vote at 12:15. I so ask unanimous consent.

Mr. HELMS. I want to talk about censorship.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. What?

Mr. DOLE. Vote at 12:15.

Mr. FOWLER. May I ask the Senator from North Carolina if he would consider modifying his amendment.

Mr. HELMS. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. FOWLER. Would the Senator from North Carolina consider modifying his amendment by dropping section 2?

Mr. HELMS. No, because not until tonight did I realize that Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John might be an applicant for Federal funds.

Mr. FOWLER. It is the depiction of what happened in Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John and art and literature, I say to the Senator that are the subjects to the amendment.

Mr. HELMS. I thought I answered the Senator's question. But this is typical of the kind of extraneous argument that has been voiced ever since the amendment was approved by the Senate. And let me make two or three points and then we can vote, as far as I am concerned.

First of all, much has been said tonight about the second prong, the distinguished Senator from Georgia and others have referred to it, Biblically, and otherwise.

I would point out to him that I put the term "nonreligion" in at the suggestion of several constitutional scholars to protect the rights of atheists, agnostics, and others the same as those of religious individuals. Since we hear so much about the rights of those groups and so little about the rights of millions of religious men, women, and children, I am somewhat astounded at the outcry against my including that term in my amendment. I am sure the cry would have been just as loud had I left it out.

As for indecency, there is a 1989 Supreme Court case, Sable Communication versus FCC, on that very point. The case says that the FCC can and could regulate indecent Dial-A-Porn, for example, and if the FCC can do it, why cannot the NEA do it?

As to censorship, Senator ARMSTRONG and Senator GRAMM, Senator HATCH, and this Senator from North Carolina have made it clear that censorship is not involved in any shape, fashion or form and I think Senators know that. And yet what do you see? All across this land you read editorials, written by knee-jerk editorial writers saying censorship, and People for the American Way has bought page ads in newspapers in my State charging that Mr. HELMS is going to censor art. It is not only untrue, it is a vicious falsehood.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HELMS. Yes.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The Senator makes an interesting point. I wonder if it occurred to the Senator from North Carolina that the same people who suggest that it would be censorship in some way for the Senator's amendment to pass and say that the Federal Government should not fund this kind of so-called art are precisely the same people who have argued in some cases successfully in the courts that when private citizens using private funds wish to erect a creche or display a symbol of the Jewish faith, say at city hall or out in front of the municipal building, somehow that violates the first amendment. You talk about sophistry. It is amazing to me that such a glaring inconsistency is not obvious to everyone.

Mr. HELMS. I think, it is obvious, but they do the best with what they have, and they do not have much. Censorship is not involved. I say it over and over again. The issue is solely this: Any artist can produce anything he wants to but nobody has a preemptive right to raid the pocketbook of the American taxpayer. That is the point of this amendment, all three prongs of it.

I say to Senators, you are going to have a chance to vote one way or another. Let us remember we become a part of what we condone. We have condoned too much and so much has been said about who is going to decide. We have had an organization that we have been funding for a long time called the National Endowment for the Arts. Sure, I want to put the blocks to them. I want them to exercise responsibility instead of exercising irresponsibility.

I am not prepared to condone forcing the taxpayers to support this kind of thing. The amendment is supported by Supreme Court decisions on all three prongs. Senators can vote as they please but a vote against this amendment is a vote for pornography and blasphemy.

● Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. President, I have stated here before that I have very deep concerns regarding the Helms amendment and its implications for Federal support of the arts. The very issues raised by this controversy are complex, and it is understandable that the conferees on this matter are having difficulty reaching agreement. But I would like to remind those involved of a few facts.

Since its inception in 1965, the National Endowment for the Arts has made approximately 85,000 grants. Only 20 complaints have been issued regarding these grants; less than one-fourth of 1 percent of the total number of grants have caused any degree of controversy. The success of the NEA speaks for itself.

I fear, however, that if we pass the restrictive language currently in the Senate bill that we will find ourselves restricting unnecessarily many works of art that the public would like to see, and would not find offensive. We will be restricting the atmosphere in which the creative process occurs. We will be injecting an element of fear into the creative process, and adding an unprecedented and I believe unconstitutional layer of censorship. We will be discouraging, not encouraging, the promotion and creation of art.

Artists who receive funding for their work from the National Endowment receive matching private funds as well. I am afraid that the restrictions in the Helms amendment will cause a further decline in private support for the arts, for fear of becoming embroiled in controversy.

There are many controversies that we create each time we fund Federal programs. That we can discuss these matters freely is at the heart of democracy. I hope that the conferees on this matter and this entire body will agree to keep the essence of democracy in our Federal support for the arts. The vast majority of projects supported by the NEA are embraced by appreciative audiences and are not questioned. In short order, the process works. The current controversy, I hope, will fade in comparison to the many great works that can be created if we will support an atmosphere of encouragement, of excellence, and one without the shackles of censorship.●

Mr. KOHL. Mr. President, this is one of those amendments which is extremely popular and extremely dangerous. The amendment is popular because almost all of us are offended by the works of Mr. Serrano and Mr. Mapplethorpe. But it is extremely dangerous because it violates the Constitution, ignores our inability to define "obscene or indecent" in any meaningful way, and is drafted so broadly that almost any work of art could be declared ineligible for funding because it might "denigrate the objects or beliefs of the adherents of a particular religion or nonreligion"—whatever a "nonreligion" means.

You know, Mr. President, under the terms of this language, I fear that we take a step forward the Iranian model of literary criticism: A model which declares that a book like Salman Rushdie's "The Satanic Verses" is heresy. Unlike Iran, we would not pronounce a sentence of death on the author—but we would prohibit the NEA from funding it. We would not banish an author like Alexander Solzhenitsyn, but we would banish him from being eligible for Federal funding. You know, Mr. President, we ridicule the Soviets and the Iranians, but we take this amendment seriously. And you know why? Politics, Mr. President, politics. We live in fear of how someone could portray our votes in a 30 second political ad. And we should be afraid because there are some pretty vile and misleading ads which can be made. But the men who signed the Constitution were also afraid—afraid of the sort of rash actions which could happen if we didn't have a body like the U.S. Senate which could consider basic issues free of the political passions of the moment.

I do not approve of the works of Mr. Seranno or Mr. Mapplethorpe. But I do approve of the Constitution and I do approve of the concept of a National Endowment for the Arts. We may need to review the way the National Endowment makes decisions—and we are. We may need to make it clear that we do not approve of the decision to fund these particular works—and we have. But we do not need to abandon the basic principles of our country, we do not need to demean the arts, we do not need to ignore the Constitution in order to make our concerns clear or to make reforms in the system effective.

Mr. President, this is a simple vote—it may not be easy, it may not be popular, it may not be understood—but it is a simple vote. We have to vote for the Constitution, we have to vote for freedom, we have to vote for meaningful reforms rather than meataxe symbolic acts which lay waste to the values which we all share.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, a few weeks ago, Tony Snow, an editor at the Washington Times, wrote an editorial in praise of Senator HELMS' effort to restore the National Endowment for the Arts sense of direction.

The NEA has clearly lost its way. The U.S. Government manual for 1989 states that the NEA is supposed to award grants to those, and I quote, "Representing the highest quality in the fields of design arts, dance, etc." The manual speaks of goals of "excellence" and support of "art forms that reflect American heritage."

This controversy has absolutely nothing to do with the first amendment protection of free speech. It deals only with whether or not American taxpayers should foot the bill for this obscene trash. Be assured, that is not a right guaranteed by the first amendment.

The reason I mention the Tony Snow editorial is that he stated what the NEA was doing was, and I quote, "the artistic equivalent of the $600 toilet seat."

I cannot go back to my tax-paying constituents at home, and tell them they must foot the bill, for NEA-backed trash, any more than I can tell them they should pay for $600 toilet seats.

Adding this amendment to instruct to the Defense appropriations bill, therefore, could not be more appropriate. I commend the Senator from North Carolina and I wholeheartedly support his amendment.

I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN PRAISE OF JESSE HELMS

(By Tony Snow)

America's art studios, faculty lounges, hair salons and op-ed pages have buzzed this summer with gossip about the possible demise of art in America. It seems that the heathen Jesse Helms wants to deny federal funding to art that oversteps the bounds of bourgeois morality.

Mr. Helms got the idea after seeing the late photographer Robert Mapplethorpe's celebration of homosexuality, an exhibition that included such poignant sights as a man urinating into another's mouth and the artist posing with the long end of a bullwhip dangling from a well-known body cavity. Mr. Helms also probably had in mind Andres Serrano's "Piss Christ," a large photograph of a crucifix immersed in the artist's most recent medium, his own urine. The Mapplethorpe and Serrano works both got money from the National Endowment for the Arts, and Mr. Helms wants to see that it doesn't happen again.

Mr. Helms' crusade has stirred many grant recipients to action. Some accuse him of crumpling up the First Amendment. Some joke that he wants to clothe every naked man, woman and child in art history. An earnest few even note that arts agencies have done such worthy things as purchasing a large magnifying glass to help Dumas Malone complete his mammoth biography of Thomas Jefferson. All this misses the point. Mr. Helms doesn't want to eliminate art. He just wants to make it voluntary.

If artists have a beef, it ought to be that Mr. Helms hasn't gone far enough. Even if you ignore the moral controversies swirling around the Mapplethorpe and Serrano exhibits, the fact remains that they're unimaginative and stupid, and they don't do anything to crush the growing suspicion that art has become a con game, practiced only by professors, weirdos and fools.

Nobody much minded this fact when the Serranos of the world relied solely on gullible millionaires. Art patronage always has been a dicey game and for every genius Medici there have been legions of aristocrats who wasted money on buffoons with berets. What angers people today is that the federal endowments for arts and humanities have made it possible for rich arts patrons to dump their losses on service station attendants, janitors and other working stiffs.

This is the artistic equivalent of the $600 toilet seat, except that there's virtually no overhead. The bad artist, unlike the venal defense contractor, pockets almost all of the loot and gets praised for his fraud.

There are only two ways to go with "federal" art, and both are bad. If you want "democratic" art, the sort of stuff that will appeal to everyone, you'd demand that the federal government subsidize Elvises and prints of wide-eyed puppies. If on the other hand you want the federal government to promote "good" art, you turn everything over to an elite, which often will make a point of funding things that "average" people don't like.

The second model describes what's going on today. Small committees, filled with nice enough political appointees, decide what kinds of music, painting, photography, sculpture and writing to promote, and what kind to throw to the wolves of public opinion. Quite often professors and critics seize control of these organizations by lecturing their peers on the latest advances in human expression and then daring citizen-appointees to disagree.

Some defenders of public art have been quite explicit about this sort of snobbery, claiming that federal art is good because smart people have picked it out. But smart people can fall for stupid things, as Stalin's intellectual shills demonstrate, and there's no guarantee that a Ph.D. magically broadens one's soul.

The other problem is that federal art, being a leisure activity of political appointees, tends to follow academic or political conventions. No serious critic would deny that the Mapplethorpe exhibit was funded primarily for its political, and not its artistic, content.

The same sort of thing applies to writing supported by federal money. No one would dare today to subsidize Ezra Pound's hauntingly beautiful translations of Chinese poetry because Pound was a fascist and an antisemite. Yet arts bureaucrats haven't hesitated to flood our libraries, bookstores and classrooms with "postmodern" dreck, which is little more than footnotes masquerading as literature. By rewarding "artists" whose chief skill lies in filling out application forms, we have brushed aside people who wander the streets in search of vital detail in favor of professors whose novels reek of library molds.

Federal art funding rests on the weird presumption that popular art can't be good and good art can't be popular. That would have been news to Tolstoy, Dickens or Dostoyevsky, who enjoyed huge popularity in their time. Masterpieces are popular because they capture the essence of sensations and emotions that we all feel, but can't properly express.

Rather than subjecting struggling artists to the dominion of second-rate arts czars, we ought to set them free to compete for the public's adoration and support, leaving rich folks and their foundations to subsidize the silly stuff. Such a move probably would improve the quality of our art and might even inspire a few grateful aesthetes to erect a statue in honor of Jesse Helms.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I can't imagine that any Member of the Senate supports the use of taxpayers' funds for the two projects in question. I find them repulsive. However, the Helms amendment goes way beyond prohibiting funding for obscene material. For instance, it would not allow Federal funds to produce materials "which denigrates the objects or beliefs of * * * a particular * * * nonreligion." It would thereby deny NEA funding for works which would denigrate the beliefs of the advocates of satanism, communism, or nazism. The Helms amendment is so broad that it would prohibit such funding, and it is for that reason that I will vote against the Helms amendment.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I oppose this amendment. I urge its defeat.

It is itself indecent and obscene.

It is a gross overreaction to something that many find very objectionable and highly inappropriate.

I personally find the despicable objects that led to this amendment deeply offensive and in awful taste.

But it is an even greater mistake to take legitimate outrage and use it as an excuse to create massive censorship of artistic creations.

It is ironic that the Senator from North Carolina offers this amendment to a national defense measure. For this type of overreaction would serve only to move our country toward the kind of system of state censorship and control of thought and expression that we have fought wars against at great cost in blood and treasure.

I have personally seen this sort of state censorship in Nazi Germany, Fascist Italy, and in the Soviet Union when it was still in its Stalinist mode. I do not want to see it in the land of the free.

Let us leave this kind of censorship to the dictatorships. Let us maintain the artistic freedom that the hapless citizens of those countries long for, and hope to find someday in democracy. So let us repudiate this amendment.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, yes, I was offended by the works of Andres Serrano and Robert Mapplethorpe.

Many of my constitutents and many of my friends were offended by these works. But Mr. President, I do not want ours to be a government which seeks to punish those whose art work offends some citizens, or those whose creative license stretches the sense of decency of many but not all.

It is my firm opinion that the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina represents punitive action on the part of Congress and, indeed, sets an undesirable and dangerous precedent. Should this provision become law, it would mark the first time in the 25-year history of the NEA that Congress will have imposed its will on that body's grant process. Such action could severely damage the ability of the Endowment to bring to the American people that art which is valuable precisely because of its ability to invoke thought and discussion. The guaranty of freedom means that we must tolerate the possibility of being offended.

In this case I believe the NEA made a mistake. And I would hope that this episode serves to remind the NEA, and those art experts who we trust to administer the NEA, that the taxpayers work hard to pay their salaries and that the taxpayers, through their representatives, ultimately control whether or not the NEA functions at all.

But let us not insult the taxpayers either. I don't think that the taxpayers want the Government telling them what they can and cannot look at in museums. I don't think that the taxpayers trust Congress to tell them what is, and what is not, art. I certainly do not.

Mr. President, we live in a country vast enough, and enlightened enough to allow people to disagree and to offend. In fact, one of the primary responsibilities of this Government is to protect the rights of those who wish to do so.

This amendment is worse than just the usual smoke and mirrors which has become all too common around here. This amendment represents politically motivated intimidation. It will have a chilling effect within the art world and raise serious questions about standards which Congress should not be defining and, in fact, is ill equipped to define. This amendment, quite frankly, violates the spirit and the intent, if not the very letter, of the first amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, the material which is sought to be reached by this amendment has been most carefully and accurately described by my fine and conscientious friend Senator HELMS and he is absolutely correct. It is grossly repugnant, patently offensive, and thoroughly obscene. If my friend would have simply placed before this Senate section 1 of his amendment, I would have spoken in favor of it and voted in favor of it with great energy and sincerity. However, sections 2 and 3 are wholly impossible of definition in the world of visual art, literature, music, the performing arts, or the law—especially as to the definition of what constitutes a "nonreligion" in section 2 or the interpretation of the entire breadth of section 3.

For those reasons I supported the motion to table, but I shall work vigorously and tirelessly to see that language which is contained in section 1 of the amendment is enacted during this session of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California.

Mr. WILSON. May I now address my question to my friend from Georgia, who as far as I know, still has the floor.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I do still have the floor. I asked Senator HELMS a question, but I still have the floor.

Mr. WILSON. Does my friend yield for a question?

Mr. FOWLER. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WILSON. I thank my friend from Georgia.

Mr. FOWLER. For a question. We only have 5 minutes left. I want the other Senator from California to have a chance.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, let me ask my friend from Georgia, first I gather he agrees this is not a question before us having to do with first amendment rights but rather with the propriety of the spending tax dollars to promote or to at least permit the exhibition of art.

If he agrees with that, in light of the question that he has asked the Senator from North Carolina, I would like to direct our attention to the third paragraph or the third standard that dealing with "material which denigrates, debases, or reviles a person, group, or class of citizens on the basis of race, creed, sex, handicap, age, or national origin."

The question really is this: Should we, as the body that is responsible for deciding whether or not to fund the NEA——

Mr. FOWLER. I say to the Senator from California, what is your question? I am not going to yield for a speech.

Mr. WILSON. Let me put the question. I will be happy to do that if I am permitted to continue.

Mr. FOWLER. I yield to the majority leader.

Mr. WILSON. I thank the Senator for his courtesy.

Mr. FOWLER. I yielded for a question, not a speech.

I yield to the majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, we only have a couple of minutes. I would simply like to say to the Senators that before I entered the Senate I spent most of my adult life in the criminal justice system. One of the most difficult, vexing questions in criminal justice and in virtually every other aspect of life is to devise a response that is appropriate to the offense. Judges, juries, legislators, deliberate over it and we do have a successful answer to it. But it is very important, when something happens that is wrong, that the response to it bears some proportion to the offense.

The only message I want to give here is that this amendment is an extreme overreaction to the perceived offense or wrong. It is impossible of definition. Is there any Senator who can stand here and say what is a nonreligion? What are the beliefs of the adherents of a nonreligion? What are the objects of a nonreligion?

Many words that we use in laws are difficult to apply. We have courts to apply them on a case-by-case merit. But here, as everywhere in life, there are degrees. And this is an attempt to place a definition on that which is inherently nondefinable. Is there a person on Earth capable of defining nonreligion? What does it mean?

I do not quarrel with the motives involved by those who pursue this amendment. These are difficult questions. These are not easy questions. What, if anything, is the role of Government is supporting the arts? That is an important question. It is worthy of debate. It is worthy of discussion.

But I say to the Members of the Senate that if we write a standard into law which says "material which denigrates the beliefs of the adherents of a nonreligion," we are writing something that not one of us can possibly define. No one here tonight has attempted to describe a nonreligion or the beliefs of a nonreligion or the objects of a nonreligion.

So whatever the offense, I urge my colleagues to consider the extreme nature of this overreaction to it. And I remind my colleagues that the conferees, most of whom have spoken here tonight, are at work and expect to have what we hope will be a sensible, rational, limited, applicable and appropriate response possibly by tomorrow.

What is there that compels us to act at this hour when we already have in place a mechanism and trusted and respected Members of the Senate and the House from both sides of the aisle who are close to a resolution which we perhaps all can support? That is as irrational as an attempt to write into law a definition of nonreligion.

I apologize to Senators. The time is nearly up. But I simply say I hope all members will join in tabling this resolution, not because they are unconcerned about the problem. I thought, frankly, that the statement made by the Senator from Missouri was one of the finest and most rational, logical, and eloquent statements I have heard in the Senate in many years. Does anyone here believe that he, an ordained minister, is unconcerned about the subjects of the amendment? I think he raised valid points, and others have.

I understand a motion to table is to be made.

Mr. President, I move to table the amendment.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine, Mr. MITCHELL, to table the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, Mr. HELMS. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN] are necessarily absent.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. JEFFORDS] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 62, nays 35, as follows:

NOT VOTING—3

So the motion to table amendment (No. 891) was agreed to.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment which would consist of title I.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, the amendment as originally reported by the Appropriations Committee had the effect of earmarking Defense Department research and development funds for eight specifically named universities in seven States. This included five ongoing projects, and three new projects.

I was concerned that the amendment, as originally drafted, was inconsistent with the principle that defense research funds should be awarded on a merit basis with all universities in all States eligible to compete.

On at least three occasions in the past year, the Senate has stated its support for competition and affirmed its commitment to merit-based awards of research contracts and grants to universities and colleges. The Senate has voted in opposition to the type of legislative earmarking of defense funds for specific universities as is reflected in the original committee amendment.

Let me restate the primary actions the Senate has taken in the past year.

First, in the fiscal year 1989 Defense Authorization Act, the Congress approved legislation mandating the use of competition in awarding Defense Department grants and contracts to universities and colleges. That legislation was designed to discourage the type of earmarking that was reflected in the original committee amendment. That new legislation takes effect on October 1—less than 1 week from today.

Second, during consideration of the fiscal year 1989 conference report on the Defense appropriation bill, the Senate deleted a provision which earmarked $81 million in funds for specific institutions. The Senate took this action even though it meant returning the conference report to the House in the waning hours just prior to sine die adjourned.

Third, in the fiscal year 1990 national Defense authorization bill, the Senate reaffirmed the prohibition on statutory earmarking of research funds to universities and colleges. We revised last year's legislation to ensure that the provisions of the Competition in Contracting Act [CICA] are applied to research contracts for universities and colleges. That provision mandates competition while providing certain merit-based standards for flexibility if DOD chooses to use it.

I hope the Senate will insist that the research funds included in the bill before us are governed by merit selection procedures and not by the process of specific earmarking.

Despite this clear and strong record, the committee amendment as originally drafted proposed to divert $37.5 million from other DOD research funds to the national defense stockpile fund so that it can then be further allocated for the eight specifically named institutions. The funding shift was required in the bill and the specific earmarking was outlined in the report language.

The original committee amendment did not give the Secretary of Defense any discretion in awarding these eight grants even if he was to report negatively on the above projects. If he found duplication in the research, no other university or college with expertise in these areas in the other 43 States could compete for this $37 million.

But this is not just the issue of funding these eight universities. It is the issue of earmarking versus competition.

The Department of Defense firmly opposes earmarking. In a letter from Secretary of Defense Cheney which I received on September 27, he indicated that since fiscal year 1986 DOD has been directed either by statute or in report language to award more than $300 million in university grants on a noncompetitive basis. He further indicated that during that time, Congress has also used the national defense stockpile as a vehicle to earmark more than $81 million for 15 projects at 10 universities.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter from Secretary Cheney on this subject be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks and also a letter I received from Senator BYRD opposing earmarking.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, the Defense Department's opposition to earmarking is clear. The American Association of Universities, and the National Association of State Universities and land-grant colleges oppose earmarking. I have received letters from the presidents of the National Science Foundation, from the National Academy of Science, and from the heads of many universities—all opposed to earmarking. At a hearing on the university research program which the Armed Services Committee held this spring, testimony was provided by witnesses from DOD, the National Science Foundation and the American Association of Universities—all decrying the practice of legislative earmarking.

I do not need to review for the Members of this body the critical role our universities and colleges play in defense-related research. The challenge that we face today is as great as ever and contribution that these institutions make in providing our future scientists, engineers, doctors, managers, and leaders cannot be underestimated.

Earmarking of scarce Defense funds does not advance this cause in the long run and it may not be the best use of these funds since other universities have been excluded from submitting competing proposals. How much of the $300 million that has been earmarked in the last 4 years should have gone to other universities? If we accepted the committee amendment as originally drafted, then we would have reopened a Pandora's box of every Senator being expected to deliver funds to home-State universities through this procedure.

If we are going to earmark—and I remain solidly opposed to it—then everyone should have the opportunity to earmark. I cannot keep turning down schools in my State and opposing earmarking or floors in the authorizing process when everyone isn't playing by the same rules. I have previously stated, only partly in jest, that perhaps each State should be allocated a certain amount of money and each Senator given an opportunity to earmark the funds as he or she sees fit. Then each Senator can be in the enviable position of deciding which college or university gets the funds in their State and which ones do not. I, for one, prefer to have DOD make those decisions on a merit basis.

Mr. President, that is exactly what the modification to the committee amendment submitted by the distinguished chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee accomplishes.

First, the modified amendment strikes the funds for the new projects contained in the original committee amendment.

Second, the amendment as modified reflects the fact that the earmarking of funds for new projects is inconsistent with the letter and spirit of the statutory requirement for merit-based selection procedures.

At the same time, the amendment as modified provides funds that could be used for the five ongoing projects if the Secretary of Defense decides that these projects should be funded. This reflects the fact that we are in a transitional situation—changing from the earmarking era to the competitive era. In this transitional environment, it is appropriate to give the Secretary of Defense the opportunity to exercise his discretion to determine whether these projects should be completed.

He is not required to fund any of these projects.

With this approach, Mr. President, I can support the amendment as modified.

Exhibit 1

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, DC.

Hon. SAM NUNN,
Chairman, Armed Services Committee, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN. Congressional earmarking of Defense Department appropriations for university research has become a growing problem. In fact, since FY 1986, the Department has been directed either by statute or in report language to award more than $300 million in university grants on a noncompetitive basis. During that time, Congress has also used the National Defense Stockpile as a vehicle to earmark more than $81 million for 15 projects at 10 universities.

The Senate Appropriations Committee recommends in Section 9099 of the FY 90 Department of Defense Appropriations bill (H.R. 3072) that the Stockpile Transaction Fund be used to earmark $37,552,000 in Research, Development, Testing and Evaluation (RDT&E) appropriations for grants for "strategic materials research, facilities, equipment, and related activities at institutions of higher education." While specific institutions are not named in the bill, the accompanying report language does name eight universities. Notably, six of those eight universities have received a total of $39 million in earmarked research over the past four years.

During this period of budgetary constraint, the Department strongly opposes any such diversions of its resources to unrequested programs for which the Department has not identified a requirement. Where we do identify requirements, the Department strongly believes that a merit-based selection process is necessary to ensure that we receive the best available products.

Sincerely,

DICK CHENEY.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
Washington, DC, July 28, 1989.

Hon. SAM NUNN,
Chairman, Committee on Armed Services, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is to assure you of my strong support for Section 223 of the Defense Authorization Bill. As you know, this section will require universities and colleges to compete for research and development funds provided to the Department of Defense.

I have serious concerns about the past practice of earmarking funds for non-competitive, sole-source grants through the National Defense Stockpile Transaction Fund to particular colleges or universities. Therefore, I urge you to resist any attempt to amend the Defense Authorization Bill for such purposes. I will join you in opposition to any such amendment, and I would appreciate being informed in advance of any attempt to bring such a proposal before the Senate.

With kind regards, I am

Sincerely,

ROBERT C. BYRD,
Chairman.

The question is on agreeing to the underlying amendment.

The excepted committee amendment beginning on page 107, line 2, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon.

AMENDMENT NO. 892

(Purpose: To amend the Stewart B. McKinney Homeless Assistance Act to make a technical change, and for other purposes)

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I send a technical amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration. On behalf of Senator KENNEDY and Senator HATCH, I offer this technical amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. HATFIELD], for himself, Mr. KENNEDY, and Mr. HATCH, proposes an amendment numbered 892.

At the end of the bill insert the following:

SEC. . STEWART B. McKINNEY HOMELESS ASSISTANCE ACT TECHNICAL AMENDMENT.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 739 of the Stewart B. McKinney Homeless Assistance Act (42 U.S.C. 11449) is amended—

(1) by striking subsection (b);

(2) by striking "; AVAILABILITY OF FUNDS" in the section heading;

(3) in subsection (a) by striking "(a) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—";

(4) by striking "(1)" and inserting "(a) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—";

(5) by striking "(2)" and inserting "(b) RATABLE REDUCTION.—"; and

(6) by striking "(3)" and inserting "(c) SPECIAL RULE.—".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply with respect to funds obligated during fiscal year 1988 and each fiscal year thereafter.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask that my vote be changed. I thought I was voting an up-or-down vote.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, may we hear?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I wish to be recorded against the motion to table. It will not change the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alaska?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, this is a technical amendment on behalf of Senator KENNEDY and Senator HATCH at the request of the Secretary of Labor, Elizabeth Dole. In passing the McKinney Act, we had precluded a carryover of unexpended funds for the demonstration programs for the homeless. We have some unexpended funds from 1988, and what this technical amendment does is permit the Secretary of Labor to continue these demonstration projects for funds appropriated in 1988. That is all it does, and I ask the Senate to adopt this amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I support passage of the McKinney technical amendment. This proposal would amend the McKinney Act to allow funds appropriated for job training for the homeless demonstration projects to be available until expended. It is supported by the administration, the Department of Labor, and Senator HATCH.

Under current law, McKinney job training funds may only be expended during the year the funds are obligated and the succeeding fiscal year. The change set forth by this amendment is necessary to prevent interruption or termination of many worthwhile demonstrations currently underway with funds obligated during fiscal year 1988. Without these amendments, availability of such funds would terminate September 30, 1989. We cannot allow this to happen. These demonstrations are providing valuable services to homeless people and contributing essential information relating to how best to provide job training to the homeless.

There are several reasons—all of them legitimate—that a significant portion of funds will remain unexpended at statutory deadline. For instance, the Department of Labor has required additional time to evaluate a large number of the applications for grants. In addition, the innovative nature of the projects funded by this act has required significant startup time for staffing and coordination by grantees.

Funds appropriated for most other programs under the McKinney Act and for national demonstrations under JTPA are available until expended. This amendment is therefore consistent with provisions governing expenditures of funds for similar programs. This amendment would provide important flexibility which would allow current and future job training demonstration projects under the McKinney Act to be completed in an effective and orderly manner.

Mr. President, interim reports on these projects are encouraging. It seems that this relatively small program is resulting in considerable gains for homeless people around the Nation. I urge my colleagues to support this technical amendment and allow this success to continue. The Nation's homeless are counting on us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 892) was agreed to.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INOUYE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

VOTE CHANGE ON AMENDMENT NO. 891

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be recorded in the negative on the motion to table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The foregoing tally has been changed to reflect the above order.)

MOLDED CASE CIRCUIT BREAKERS

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I wish to discuss the status of the procurement of replacement molded case circuit breakers for Navy ships.

In 1983 and 1984 the Navy conducted shock trials of electromechanical circuit breakers on Navy combatants. I have been informed that the trials revealed that the circuit breakers tripped. Such a tripping would cause a shutdown, during combat or collision, of a ship's electrical systems and could be catastrophic for Navy ships and their crews.

In recognition of this demonstration of the need for replacement circuit breakers, the conference report on the fiscal year 1989 Defense Appropriations Act included the following agreement:

> The conference agree that the Navy should review the requirement for molded case circuit breakers and submit a plan for addressing any requirement within the fiscal year 1990 budget request.

The fiscal year 1990 budget request did not mention the replacement circuit breakers. On March 30, 1989, however, then-Acting Secretary of the Navy Garrett wrote to the Senate and House Appropriations Committees in response to the conference report:

> I am responding to the requirement in the FY-89 DOD Appropriations Conference Report that directed us to submit a plan for molded case circuit breakers.
> We are proceeding with state of the art, solid state circuit breaker trip units to improve maintainability, provide selective protection and improve continuity of electrical service to electronics, weapons, and other critical systems. An effort is now being made to use current year funding to start the program and meet these requirements.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, it appears that the Navy's support for the procurement of the replacement molded case circuit breakers was not included in its fiscal year 1990 budget request. The absence of this information apparently contributed to the absence of the $6 million in funding needed for this program in the fiscal year 1990 authorization bill.

If, however, the authorizing committees had been notified of the Navy's position through its budget request, the replacement molded case circuit breaker program surely would have been given due consideration. It seems to this Senator that a special case exists for inclusion of the funding for the program in the fiscal year 1990 appropriations bill. I hope that the $6 million will be accepted by the appropriations conferees.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE COAL PURCHASES

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I take this opportunity to focus the Senate's attention on a matter of extreme importance to the U.S. coal industry. The fiscal 1990 Defense appropriations bill which we consider today amends provisions in title IX, section 9013, subsections (b) and (c) regarding mandated coal and coke purchases for Department of Defense facilities in Europe.

The amended versions of these subsections would permit conversions of heating plants and facilities in Europe to oil or natural gas only if they are cost effective. I am advised that this proviso mitigates the total conversion ban which was included in the fiscal year 1989 appropriations bill. The purpose of the ban was to safeguard the Pentagon's current energy policy while opportunities for utilizing alternative means for U.S. energy generation were considered.

I am advised that even if this proviso were to be stricken from the bill, the Department of Defense intends to go ahead with conversions of 21 more facilities in Europe. I am concerned that such conversions will jeopardize the regional energy master plan recently completed for the Kaiserslautern and Ramstein military communities in the Federal Republic of Germany. This plan represents a cooperative effort between local German heating interests and the American anthracite industry. The plan emphasizes the cogeneration, the simultaneous production of both heat and electricity, and takes special care to comply with local environmental standards.

Mr. President, I believe the U.S. coal industry deserves a commitment on the part of the Department of Defense to comply with the spirit of the 1989 statute. Such a commitment necessarily will entail measures to delay conversions of U.S. facilities in Europe pending a fair evaluation of the master plan.

V-22 OSPREY

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I take this opportunity to bring to the Senate's attention to a matter of special importance. I am concerned that the fiscal year 1990 Defense appropriations bill does not contain fiscal year 1990 funds for advanced procurement of the V-22.

I believe the decision to eliminate fiscal year 1990 funding for the V-22 does not reflect sensible procurement planning. Delaying procurement of the V-22 will only lead to higher per unit costs should a determination be made at a later date to proceed with the program. This decision appears particularly unwise given that the Navy's designated alternative to the V-22—increased purchase of modified

CH-53E Chinooks—did not receive the funding called for in the administration's request.

I believe the position taken by the House Armed Services Committee with respect to the V-22 is the correct one: allow the program to continue in research and development, and begin gearing up for production with a small amount of advanced procurement funding, while providing for an independent evaluation of the program by the Secretary of Defense.

The question has been asked, why should the V-22 Program receive any procurement funding in the new fiscal year's defense budget, given that funding was provided in the bill for research and development, and the program is about 10 months behind schedule? As my colleagues know, the transition from research and development to production is not a simple turning on of a switch, but is just that, a transition. As such, a transition requires lead time and planning to make it as smooth and efficient as possible.

Advanced procurement of the V-22 in fiscal year 1990 is necessary to protect production options for fiscal year 1991 and initial delivery plans for spring 1993. Furthermore, advanced procurement will keep the V-22 industry infrastructure intact and ensure that the V-22 is a production program, as originally envisioned, and not simply a technology demonstrator.

The V-22 represents an essential future component in short-range tactical air operations. No helicopter in our current fleet can match the V-22's combination of speed, range, and deployability. These vital attributes will permit the conducting of amphibious assaults from protected distances and provide the speed and maneuverability to survive close-in combat.

Mr. President, I realize there has been much debate regarding the military usefulness of this weapon system. I am advised that three major studies, dating from 1982 to as recently as January 1988, have focused on the V-22's cost, operational effectiveness and survivability in sustained warfare operations. These studies conducted for the Secretary of the Navy were a joint technical assessment, a cost and operational effectiveness analysis, and a subsequent operations ashore study conducted for the Secretary of the Navy. All three studies concluded that the V-22 is the most cost-effective solution to meet the joint services requirements.

Much concern also has been expressed regarding the commercial viability of the V-22. I am advised that to date private industry has expended at least $366 million on tilt-rotor technology. This investment has included composite manufacturing, rotor and dynamics development and testing, digital fly-by-wire technology, engine technology development, and capital investment.

Finally, I take this opportunity to notify my colleagues that on September 14, 1989, the V-22 reached its most important development milestone to date: it accomplished full conversion from helicopter mode to airplane mode while in flight.

Mr. President, as we are all aware, our country faces a period of great uncertainty regarding future conflict scenarios and mission requirements. One thing we do know, however, is that flexibility in mission will be an essential criterion for all of our services. I am convinced the Osprey is an aircraft which fulfills this need, and urge my colleagues to support this vital defense program.

IMPROVED RECOVERY VEHICLE

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I wish to focus the Senate's attention on the requirement for $13 million to finish testing the technical data package for the M88A2 Improved Recovery Vehicle [IRV]. Further tests are required to determine whether the IRV meets certain technical specifications with regard to hoisting and removing M1A1 main battle tanks from the battlefield. Furthermore, if the Army decides to retrofit the M88, the current recovery vehicle, with the technical data package for the IRV, it would only be prudent to first validate the technology.

The IRV was conceived mainly to perform four primary functions and fulfill one secondary role. The primary functions include: towing of disabled vehicles, preparing disabled vehicles for evacuation, recovering mired vehicles, and righting tipped/nosed-in vehicles. When not employed for these primary missions, the recovery vehicle fills a secondary function of providing lifting and movement capabilities for maintenance operations.

Another issue of concern is a provision in the fiscal year 1990 Defense Appropriations bill which reallocates $120.4 million in fiscal year 1988 and fiscal year 1989 procurement funds, originally designated for advanced procurement of the IRV, for additional procurement of M1A1 tanks.

Mr. President, while the Army continues to experience a shortage of its current recovery vehicle, the M88, it does not seem sensible to this Senator to transfer funds designated for procurement of the follow-on to this vehicle, the IRV, to a separate account for additional procurement of the very weapon system this vehicle is intended to recover. Furthermore, I am advised that in the absence of a sufficient number of recovery vehicles, surprisingly the current military plan is to use functioning M1 tanks to tow damaged tanks off the battlefield.

Mr. President, I find this reallocation of funds unwise, not to mention wasteful. Why should the battlefield capability of a sophisticated asset such as the M1A1 tank be jeopardized to help remove another M1A1 from the battlefield? Moreover, towing operations performed by other tanks would place unacceptable strain on their powertrains, which are not designed to perform this strenuous task.

The efficient removal and recovery of damaged tanks is a battlefield mission with a compelling history. The Israelis, during the Yom Kippur War, for example, practiced the recovery of damaged tanks with tremendous success. The Israelis suffered 75 percent losses within the first 18 hours of battle. A high percentage of the damaged vehicles were recovered, and 80 percent of the damaged vehicles were returned to the battle within 24 hours. Reports indicate that as the campaign continued, some Israeli vehicles were recovered, repaired, and returned to service as many as five times.

Mr. President, I am concerned when the U.S. Armed Forces do not have at their disposal the necessary capabilities to fulfill their designated mission. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues that it would be unwise to discontinue testing of the IRV, the only vehicle capable of recovering the 61-ton M1A1 tank, when no feasible alternative exists.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article from the October 1989 issue of the Armed Forces Journal International regarding this subject be printed in the RECORD. While it is somewhat long, I believe it is worth inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, because of its value in explaining the importance of a viable tank recovery capability.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Armed Forces Journal, Oct. 1989]

SEVEN YEARS AFTER M-1 FIELDING, ARMY STILL CAN'T YANK TANKS

(by John G. Roos)

If U.S. Army armor units had to fight today, their combat effectiveness would be sharply diminished by a tank recovery fleet incapable of retrieving disabled M-1 Abrams tanks. In order to safely get battle-damaged tanks out of harm's way, recovery crews would each need two of the currently fielded M-88A1 tank recovery vehicles or one M-88 and an operational M-1 tank—the second vehicle serving as a rear restraint.

The problem isn't new. When 61-ton M-1s began replacing 56- to 59-ton M-60s in 1982, the Army realized that its M-88A1 recovery vehicles—designed to pull M-60s—couldn't safely retrieve the heavier M-1s. Seven years after the Abrams tanks entered service, the Army remains unable to efficiently recover those vehicles.

According to a GAO report released in July, the Army has recognized that it has "urgently" needed an improved tank recovery vehicle since 1981. "With the growth in weight of the Army's main battle tanks to 65, and eventually to 70, tons," the current recovery vehicle "does not have the traction or the power to tow tanks weighing 60 tons or more over unpaved slopes, and it must work in pairs to safely tow these tanks."

In a May message to several four-star Army commanders, former Army Armor School Commandant Maj. Gen. Thomas Tait (now deputy commander of Second Army) said that the M-88A1's inability to safely recover Abrams tanks "has been a high priority TRADOC [Training and Doctrine Command] Battlefield Development Plan (BDP) deficiency for the past six years. With each improvement to the Abrams, and consequent weight growth, the situation becomes worse." Directives requiring two vehicles to recover an M-1 were "intended as a short-term fix, pending the imminent fielding of an improved recovery vehicle. This practice is inefficient in peacetime and would be unacceptable in combat."

In response to plans for armor forces to use operational tanks to tow battle-damaged vehicles. Tait said: "We cannot afford to withdraw mission-capable tanks from combat to recover each disabled vehicle to a repair site. This would be an unwarranted draining of our combat power. We cannot afford to have disabled tanks on the battlefield and initiate like vehicle recovery after the fight.

"Our tankers generally have more tasks to do than they have time to accomplish. Furthermore, the longer a disabled tank remains stationary and exposed, the more likely it is to sustain multiple hits. Tanks which would likely be repairable if quickly recovered, therefore, may become catastrophically destroyed when recovery is delayed."

Tait also pointed out that the M-1's compartmentation and venting of fuel and ammunition make it "much more likely than the M-60 and older tanks to withstand hits with only localized damage rather than high-order destruction. More importantly, the crewmen of a disabled tank are more likely to survive and return to battle if we execute timely recovery operations."

Craig Ireland, TRADOC Systems Staff Officer for recovery vehicles, told AFJI that the prospect of a disabled tank receiving additional hits from enemy gunners is high: "Both US and Soviet tank training calls for shooting tanks until they burn."

TRADOC has generated a number of studies bearing out the importance of the Army's logistical "tail" to its combat "teeth." One such effort, done by the Ordnance Center and School, used a three-day AirLand Battle simulation. Using current recovery and maintenance capability, a four-battalion tank brigade which began the "battle" with 232 M-1s had 99 operational tanks at the end of the third day. With the addition of armored maintenance vehicles—part of the "package" to complement new recovery vehicles—the brigade ended the third day with 163 tanks, a 60% increase in fighting capability.

NOT FOR LACK OF TRYING

Two years ago, it looked as though the Army was about to tackle the tank recovery problem, which by then had become a regular entry on the Service's annual list of its top 20 battlefield deficiencies. A long-term acquisition strategy was developed, based on projected requirements of next-generation (Block III) M-1s and follow-on "future tanks."

In 1986 the Army was told by Congress to hold a comparative test to select a successor for the M-88A1s. The test, held in May and June 1988, was a two-month face-off between BMY's M-88A1E1 and a General Dynamics Land Systems Division contender. On December 16th the Army announced its selection of the BMY vehicle. The M-88A1E1, at 69.3 tons, is about 13 tons heavier than its 56-ton predecessor. Most of the additional weight—eight tons—is in the armor for increased ballistic protection; the remainder is spread out in such subsystems as the boom and winch.

Concurrent with the announcement, the Army added an additional $3.6 million (to cover new work) to the $18.9 million firm, fixed-price, full-scale development (FSD) contract under which BMY had been developing its candidate since January 1987. That FSD contract indicated that the Army planned to purchase an initial batch of 849 product-improved M-88s through Fiscal Year 1994.

NEW DOD TEAM, NEW PRIORITIES

In January, then Under Secretary of the Army Michael P. W. Stone (now Secretary of the Army) apparently needed a "bill payer" for Field Artillery Ammunition Support Vehicles (FAASV) for mechanized artillery forces. The armored FAASVs, which will replace the current family of "soft" M-548 ammunition carriers, can deploy forward in the same areas as the howitzer units which they support. The vulnerable M-548s, on the other hand, have to remain about 500 meters behind their assigned howitzers.

According to a January 17, 1989, memo to Stone from Lt. Gen. Donald Pihl, military deputy to the assistant secretary of the Army for research, acquisition, and logistics. "If the improved recovery vehicle [program were] killed now, it is estimated the resultant funds could procure about 80% of the FAASVs required to support the howitzer improvement program (total HIP procurement is 1,700 howitzers)."

Forewarned that the Pentagon planned to cut off funds for the recovery vehicles, on April 6th five Senators and 16 Congressmen signed a letter to Secretary of Defense Richard Cheney stating their strong support for the improved recovery vehicle (IRV) program. The letter said that "the fact that one of the Army's premier combat systems, the M-1 tank, has been in service for over five years without [adequate] support reflects a major flaw in the acquisition system. A recent survey of key Army commanders again validated the basis and urgency of the requirement. They stressed that we cannot afford to continue to endanger the lives of our soldiers and our allies through the use of unsafe procedures. Nor can we accept the operational consequences of not being able to sustain our armed force in combat. The current makeshift M-1 tank recovery means is highly dangerous and should be eliminated as soon as possible."

Unmoved by the appeal, a few days later Cheney announced to the House Armed Services Committee that he was canceling the contract with BMY for the convenience of the government. Cheney told the HASC that the BMY M-88A1E1 recovery vehicle "never served its purpose in being able to perform the mission assigned to it, and I couldn't find many people in the [Defense] Department who were advocates of the M-88 recovery vehicle for tanks."

Deputy Secretary of Defense Donald Atwood amplified Cheney's comments when it was his turn to testify before the House Armed Services Committee in mid-June:

We terminated the Army's improved recovery vehicle program, which had experienced testing problems, and for which existing tracked vehicles provide feasible alternatives. The last Reagan FYDP program included $311-million for 215 IRVs. The total proposed program of 291 IRVs was insufficient to equip all active forces, let alone equip the Reserves or provide war reserve stocks. Alternatively, one could generate about $300-million by delaying for three years the modification of our M-1 tank inventory with the Block-II improvements, which are needed to counter projected armor improvements in Warsaw Pact tanks. The basic judgement here is that it is preferable to avoid damage to our tanks in the first place than to spend heavily on pulling a few more damaged tanks from battlefields that we might not control for long.

Cheney's decision, according to Ireland, apparently boiled down to a choice between funds for systems that provide offensive combat capability or those that sustain the forces. "The question is, do you want something that can influence the first hour or the first day of battle, or the fourth day of battle?" The Army's approach to heavy force modernization follows a straightforward set of priorities: "rearm, refuel, recover, and maintain," he said.

A Pentagon official told AFJI that the recovery vehicle program was canceled "because of other priorities." He said that although the Army tests of the BMY and General Dynamics vehicles had found that both candidates were "adequate," a "better way to put that would be that both vehicles were marginally adequate."

He said that the "Heavy Force Modernization Program effort is where the Army has focused its recovery future. The IRV is not one of the top six priorities; it's about number 18 on the list. Indications from TRADOC are that when we next prioritize, the recovery variant will be very high."

BACK TO SQUARE ONE

The program cancellation threw Army armor officials back to square one. After informing senior Army leaders that he was "very concerned" about the loss of the recovery vehicle program. Tait sent a message to affected units reiterating critical safety items. "I fear the 68-ton M-1A1 to be fielded in USAREUR [US Army Europe] this fall will not be forgiving to violators. Don't let our soldiers get hurt needlessly." he wrote.

The three-page message informed readers that, "regrettably, for the foreseeable future, we must continue to use a rear restraint vehicle when towing the Abrams tank with the M-88A1."

Concerning on the practical, day-to-day implications of Cheney's decision, Tait reminded readers that, when retrieving an M-1 with another Abrams," soldiers must be protected from the Abrams exhaust heat when hooking and unhooking towing devices. Special care should be taken to avoid exposed skin contact with hot tow bars. If towing for extended distances, or if hooked up to a running vehicle for a prolonged time, additional heat protection to towed vehicle headlights, vision blocks, and driver's compartment must be considered." When cresting hills, or traversing ditches, he warned, excessive speeds will cause the tow bar to snap "and a catastrophic accident may result."

Ten soldiers have received minor injuries during tank recovery operations during the past year, according to a US Army Safety Center spokesman.

An Army official involved with the IRV program stressed that the Service is very concerned about soldiers' safety, and feels that present recovery procedures, if followed, are reasonable alternatives to obtaining a new IRV fleet. "Things are going on to fix the heat problem, for instance. The Army is developing a thermal blanket to cover the fronts of towed tanks. We're also developing a new tow bar," he said. "These [alternative] procedures, however, would create combat limitations," he added.

But Tait's message also touched upon a much broader implication of Cheney's decision: "While the armor force must bear the immediate brunt of this setback, the impacts are much farther-reaching—the Army's entire battlefield recovery strategy, formulated in 1985, is now badly out of kilter.

"As armor units [would have] received M-88A2s, our M-88A1s would have gone to fill existing Army-wide recovery vehicle shortages and to displace overmatched M-578s in Bradley and HIP howitzer battalions. Now there are no assets forthcoming to fulfill these needs."

RIPPLE EFFECT

The Army figures that it needs about 4,200 armored recovery vehicles of various types for all of its combat forces. This figure includes not only seven tank recovery vehicles for each M-1 tank battalion, but also armored recovery vehicles capable of retrieving 155-mm self-propelled howitzers, M-113 personnel carriers, and Bradley M-2 and M-3 infantry fighting vehicles. But the retrieval capability for all of this equipment has suffered from the same malady as that which afflicts tank units. Heavier new and "product improved" tracked combat equipment made its way to Army units without corresponding improvements in retrieval capability.

Had the Army's plans for new recovery vehicles materialized, the older M-88A1s would have replaced M-578 recovery vehicles in self-propelled howitzer and Bradley fighting vehicle units. The 578s, in turn, were slated to go to M-113 units and US-based Bradley units.

TRADOC is now putting together a new plan to address retrieval deficiencies throughout the armor force. Tackling the problem from "immediate," "near-term," and "far-term," perspectives, the plan puts procurement of an improved recovery vehicle in the last category.

A July Army memorandum outlining the M-88A1E1 cancellation sums up the action's impact on heavy artillery forces: "None of the alternatives, with the exception of the HFM [Heavy Force Modernization] recovery variant, will increase recovery assets for artillery howitzer improvement (HIP) vehicles (need a medium recovery vehicle—M-99A1 in lieu of light recovery vehicle, M-578). The only other alternatives are to procure more M-88A1 medium recovery vehicles for the HIP requirement or reallocate exisitng M-88A1s."

But, also in July, Congressional overseers of the on-again, off-again recovery program ruled out any interim purchase of M-88s. In its markup of the FY90-91 DOD authorization bill, the legislators expressed concerns over M-88 safety deficiencies. They recommended a provision be included in the final bill requiring the Army to complete a new round of technical and operational testing before making an FY91 production decision. The Army was told to use $13 million in prior-year funds to complete the tests.

BMY: BAD NEWS

First, the contract cancellation, and now the prospect of a new round of testing have all but taken BMY out of the running for producing the Army's improved recovery vehicle. "Today, BMY has the edge [over General Dynamics] because of its production line," Dan Harvey, BMY-Combat Systems program manager for heavy force modernization told AFJI. "However, the firm that makes the castings for our hulls—Rogers Olympic Corporation [ROC] in Seattle—is ready to close its production line by October. We've been told that once the line is shut down, they won't start it up again." A BMY memo sent to M-88 subcontractors in August said that "without additional M-88A1 sales, Rogers Olympic will go out of business, leaving a minimum two-year gap in production while a new source is qualified. During this period, no recovery vehicles (M-88A1 or M-88A2) can be produced."

Harvey said that BMY has told the Army that ROC will keep its line open if there is a market for three sets of castings a month. "BMY stretched out the M-88 production line to September 1989, a year beyond the Army's original plan," he said. "We were making 20 hulls a month under a 1983 contract, and we slowed the line from 20, to 15, then to seven. While we're hoping for some foreign sales, which would let us take the three a month, those contracts are still pending." Even those sales, Harvey added, might not be adequate to keep the line open, since ROC has about 50 completed hulls ready for shipment.

To date, 20 overseas customers have ordered 496 M-88A1s; all but four have been delivered.

M-88 SUPPORTERS CLOSE RANKS

In a last-ditch effort to continue M-88 production, the vehicle's supporters have launched an all-out assault on Capitol Hill. Tom Druce, an aide to Senator John Heinz (R-PA), told AFJI that keeping those production lines operating is the first priority. "As we get into the [House/Senate Authorization] conference process, you can expect Senator Heinz to lead the fight to keep the burners going for BMY. We're just looking for enough time to let the Army certify this vehicle."

M-88 program supporters also are orchestrating an all-out lobbying campaign involving the system's 17 subcontractors. The group has targeted 16 Congressmen and five Senators, including nine members of the House and Senate Appropriations Committees, in their effort to keep the program alive.

The group's ultimate goal is to see language in the final DOD appropriations bill directing the Army "to procure a minimum of three M-88A1s per month using prior year (FY88 and FY89) IRV procurement funds offset by future foreign sales."

Letter writers are suggesting that the Committee include language in its report indicating that the legislators are "concerned about the ability of the Army to maintain a warm IRV production base."

Michael Morris, IRV program Manager for General Dynamics, agrees with BMY's Harvey on one key point: "It might put us in a better position if BMY's production line is closed down."

Morris said that during the Army's source selection process. General Dynamics pitted its IRV against BMY's M-88A1E1. The GAO reported that production models of the systems, as tested, would cost $2.2- and $1.2-million, respectively. But Morris said his company's contender has increased capabilities to match the higher price tag. Using the same chassis as the tank it is designed to tow, the General Dynamics IRV offered an "NBC [nuclear biological, chemical] protection system and the ability to tow a 70-ton tank at 30 miles per hour. And there's another significant point—our IRV has more than 50 percent commonality with the M-1A1 tank."

The Army's original requirement document, according to Morris, called for an NBC system and tough mobility requirements, so the retriever could stay with supported tanks even if they had to traverse a contaminated area. "Based on our operational cost analysis," Morris said, "our vehicle will recover many more tanks during a typical day of combat" before the crew needs to rest.

Donald Gilleland, Communications Director for Land Systems Division, feels that the Army's initial selection of the BMY contender over this company's vehicle was driven primarily by financial considerations. "Unfortunately, sometimes technology loses out to financial considerations. But we pointed out to the Army that buying recovery vehicles with chasis common to the Abrams could result in savings over both programs. They'd save money throughout the system's life cycle, in supply, maintenance, and logistics."

Gilleland said that General Dynamics is "in contact with several foreign countries that want the Abrams, and that also want our recovery vehicle. We're convinced that there's a need for our recovery vehicle."

Karl Oskoian, General Dynamics Land Systems Division Communications Manager, said that if the Army were to hold a Cost and Operational Effectiveness analysis, the higher price tag on his company's vehicle would be seen as money worth paying. "We offer performance equal to M-1 tanks, commonality with fielded equipment, use of nondevelopmental items, and growth capability similar to that of future main tanks." Morris added, "The M-88 has seen its day. It's been around for 30 years."

Unless the Army comes up with funds for a successor to the M-88A1, it looks as though the early-'60s-vintage recovery vehicles will be around for many more years—trying to keep up with tanks they are unable to retrieve.

IMPACT AID: AN URGENT NEED

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to a worthy provision in the House version of the Defense appropriation bill which I hope can be accepted in conference; namely, a provision of impact aid, or assistance to local school districts which are shouldering the burden of educating the children of military personnel from nearby bases.

This is an issue of great importance in the State of Rhode Island. The Navy and DOD payroll in the State increased by $11.1 million in 1988 over the previous year, and a total of 12 surface ships are now homeported at Newport. Permanent active duty military personnel in the Newport area totaled 5,682 in 1988; in addition, attendance at the 10 schools comprising the Navy Education and Training Center totaled 9,986 over the course of the year.

With this influx of service personnel have come military families with children in numbers exceeding the planned capacity of local schools. The impact has been particularly hard felt in the town of Middletown which lies immediately north of the city of Newport on Aduidneck Island. As a result, Middletown must build additional classrooms.

For this reason, I was delighted to note that the House Appropriations Committee recommended the sum of $10 million in impact aid for school districts which would be unable to provide a minimum level of education without such assistance. The House report noted that the School Improvements Amendments Act of 1988 provided for assistance to such schools from Department of Defense section 6 funds, but that no such assistance was budgeted by the Department.

I am very sorry indeed that the Senate Defense Appropriations Subcommittee did not see fit to follow the lead of the House and in fact deleted the provision for $10 million in impact aid. This is a lamentable omission, in my view, and one which if not corrected can exacerbate relationships between our military establishments and surrounding communities across the country.

Mr. President, education is as essential as housing and health care for military dependents. It is an established obligation on the part of the Federal Government which must keep pace with the changing needs of the armed services. The amount in question at this time is extremely modest in the context of this appropriation bill, but it could have an impact many times over in the school districts where it is most needed.

I urge the Senate conferees of Defense appropriations to keep faith with communities serving our Armed Forces and accept the House provision for $10 million in section 6 impact aid.

BASE CLOSURES

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, on Tuesday of this week, the Senate overwhelmingly voted to remove a requirement from the Defense appropriations bill that would have required the Comptroller General to certify to Congress that each realignment or closure would result in savings before the Secretary of Defense could use appropriations to implement these realignments.

I followed with interest the discussion between our chairman, Senator INOUYE, Senator LEVIN of Michigan, and Senator WARNER, the distinguished ranking minority member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, the committee that authored the Base Closure Act. Senator INOUYE noted that the fiscal year 1990 Senate Armed Services bill, S. 1352, already contains a provision that requires the Comptroller General to review the findings of the Secretary's Commission on Base Realignment and Closure.

Is that the understanding of the chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee?

Mr. INOUYE. Let me respond to my friend from Arizona that this is the case. The Senate Defense authorization bill as passed by the Senate on August 4 contains a provision, section 331, that requires the Comptroller General to submit to the Secretary of Defense and the Armed Services Committees of the House and Senate, not later than November 15, 1989, a report on the methodology, findings, and recommendations of the Base Closure Commission.

Mr. President, I am providing a copy of this section to be printed in the RECORD. I note that this provision requires the Comptroller General to assess inaccuracies in the data used by the Commission that may affect the Commission's recommendations.

Mr. DECONCINI. I ask my good friend the distinguished chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Senator NUNN, would he be willing to make the report of the Comptroller General called for in the Defense authorization bill available to members of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee?

Mr. SIMON. Might I also inquire if the chairman of the Armed Services Committee will make these findings available to interested Senators who are not on the relevant defense committees but have bases that are affected by the Commission's recommendations?

Mr. NUNN. I can assure the Senators that the findings will be available to any Member of the Senate. Obviously, the recommendations of the Commission are of interest to many Members not on my committee. It is not our intent to restrict these results to the Armed Services Committee.

Mr. DECONCINI. Let me ask the distinguished chairman, what should happen if the Comptroller General reports back that the Commission made significant errors?

Mr. NUNN. Obviously, if significant errors were made, one would expect the Secretary of Defense to reconsider whether these realignments should proceed. As Senator WARNER stated on Tuesday, Secretary Cheney is fair and a man of good conscience. If significant errors are identified by the Comptroller General in the report required under S. 1352 indicating that a base should not be closed, our committee at least would expect the Secretary to come forward with a proposal that redresses these mistakes.

Mr. DECONCINI. I thank the Senator and look forward to the Comptroller General's assessment.

Mr. INOUYE. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the section in question be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the section was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PART C—BASE CLOSURE AND REALIGNMENT MATTERS

SEC. 331. BASE CLOSURE REPORT

(a) REPORT REQUIREMENT.—Not later than November 15, 1989, the Comptroller General of the United States shall submit to the Secretary of Defense and the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and the House of Representatives a report on the methodology, findings, and recommendations of the Commission on Base Realignment and Closure.

(b) CONTENT OF REPORT.—(1) The report shall include an analysis of the following:

(A) The adequacy and accuracy of the information relied upon as a basis for the Commission's recommendations.

(B) The process used in the determination of military missions and requirements and the military value of the bases in meeting such missions and requirements.

(C) The criteria used to select bases to be closed or realigned.

(D) The findings regarding military and civilian personnel reductions and associated relocation and termination expenses.

(E) The findings regarding nonrecurring costs, including expenses such as costs of construction, personnel, and logistics.

(F) The findings regarding long-term, annual savings, including the estimated cost amortization period.

(G) The findings regarding assumed proceeds from property sales for each applicable initiative.

(H) The findings regarding any environmental restoration costs that must be incurred in order to make it possible to sell or transfer excess property.

(2) Where any inaccuracies in the information referred to in paragraph (1)(A) are noted in the report, the Comptroller General shall include in the report an assessment of the effects of such inaccuracies upon the ranking of installations by the Commission within functional categories.

HARM MISSILE

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, comments have been made on the Senate floor that could imply that the HARM missile manufacturer has been recommended for suspension by the Navy for fraudulent actions associated with a printed wiring board called a stator switch, in the safe and arm device (fuze). This is not the case. Texas instruments, the missile manufacturer, is not involved with any pending suspension associated with the printed wiring board used in the safe and arm fuze.

Over the past several months there has been an ongoing investigation of a tactical missile fuze manufacturer, Asher Engineering. Micronics has produced fuzes for several tactical missiles other than HARM. HARM fuzes are built by Piqua, Raymond & Bomar. However, the HARM fuze did use a printed wiring board built by Asher. When concern over the printed wiring board came to light, Texas Instruments, the HARM prime contractor, and the Navy conducted an in depth evaluation of the printed wiring board and after extensive testing by four independent certified labs and one Navy laboratory, determined the boards to be acceptable. The Navy has stated that "No HARM missile has ever failed due to the Asher printed wiring board, not in the lab testing, flight testing, or any other case."

To support present and future safe and arm printed wiring board requirements, Texas Instruments has qualified a second source, and they are on line without an impact to present production missile delivery schedules. Asher Engineering has suspended operations.

The safe and arm mechanism of the various tactical missiles have stator switches of different complexities, with the HARM board being the simplest, a sing-sided, one inch square circuit card with no components. With respect to the HARM part, the only concern was related to documentation and omission of several tests during the board manufacturing. The test program, which included the analysis and testing of 269 circuit boards from several production lots, was designed to validate the omitted tests and verify the reliability and performance. In addition, samples were pulled from storage representing all the previous production lots. The results of the test program showed that the printed wiring boards for HARM meets the requirements for performance and reliability.

The key points of this issue are: First, Asher Engineering, a second tier subcontractor, has suspended operations; not the missile contractor. Second, there is no reliability issue with the HARM safe and arm fuze; there has never been a failure attributed to the Asher board.

NATO DEFENSE BURDEN-SHARING

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I would like to comment on the proposed amendment to the Department of Defense appropriations bill that would have brought home 30,000 American troops from Europe unless our NATO allies increased their support for the maintenance of our forces in Europe.

I voted for that amendment because of my longstanding position in favor of greater burden-sharing by our allies. It is time for our wealthy NATO and Pacific allies to begin paying their fair share of their own defense. This was a difficult decision for me because we are in the midst of conventional arms reduction negotiations, and I don't want to interfere with that process. But this amendment would not have unilaterally withdrawn American troops from Europe. Those troops would have been withdrawn only if the Europeans refused to increase their support for their own defense.

The United States provides over $130 billion in defense of Western Europe, consuming nearly one-half of total U.S. defense spending. It does not make sense for the United States to subsidize the defense of the rest of the free world while our allies profit from our trade deficit and invest their earnings in American land and businesses. It is unfair to expect American taxpayers to continue carrying more than their fair share of this burden.

A few years ago I offered an amendment to reduce U.S. troop strength in Europe by a substantial amount. That amendment was not adopted. I supported efforts to include overseas bases in the base-closing legislation passed in the last Congress. Those efforts also failed. I supported a successful amendment to this year's Defense authorization bill to encourage a greater financial commitment by Japan to its own defense. I also supported a stronger amendment that would have required Japan to pay 100 percent of the cost of our forces stationed there, but that amendment was not adopted.

We need to let our wealthy European allies know that we are serious about greater defense cost-sharing by them. This amendment would have done that.

MANUFACTURING TECHNOLOGY PROGRAM

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee and its ranking minority member, I would like to briefly comment on a program of importance to the advancement of the productivity and preparedness of the U.S. defense industrial base as well as improved competitiveness of this country vis-a-vis other industrial nations. This program is the Manufacturing Technology Program, the Mantech Program.

In deliberating on the National Defense Authorization Act for fiscal year 1990 and 1991, the Senate Armed Services Committee increased funding for the Department of Defense Mantech Program by $60 million overall and at my request included report language urging the Department of the Navy to carefully review the merits of establishing a "center of excellence for advanced manufacturing systems" that could serve as a national demonstration project and model for the development and transfer of new manufacturing technologies in support of Navy and other Defense Department needs.

In its consideration of the fiscal year 1990 Defense appropriations bill, the Senate Appropriations Committee provided full funding for the Navy Mantech Program and directed "* * * that $2,893,120 shall be available solely for establishing a center of excellence for advanced flexible manufacturing systems."

The purpose of the above-mentioned effort is to assure the establishment of a pilot regional teaching factory employing flexible computer integrated manufacturing systems in conjunction with Marshall University in Huntington, WV. This new institute would be a regional center of excellence which would serve as a national demonstration model for the development and transfer of new manufacturing technologies in support of the U.S. Navy and other Department of Defense needs. It would be designed to be a practical organization integrated with and responsive to the needs of local industry and would transfer technologies developed at the institute and elsewhere to the industrial base. It would also enhance the competitive posture of an economically depressed area to assure successful competition in regional, national, and world markets. The institute would be organized into four basic areas: education and training; operations and technical services; information resources and research; and research and development.

Since the above reports and directives were issued, discussions have transpired which may indicate that the Air Force Mantech Program, which has had an ongoing working relationship with the National Center for Manufacturing Sciences [NCMS], an industrial not-for-profit research and development consortium established by the President's machine tool action plan in 1986, may be a more appropriate mechanism for developing the "center of excellence," endorsed by both the authorizing and appropriations committees. It would appear that using the existing administrative structure, already established by the Air Force Mantech Program with the NCMS, could be a more effective and efficient way to fund such a center. These funds are provided to the National Center for Manufacturing Sciences on a matching basis with funds provided from the private sector.

I recommend that consideration be given in conference to enlarging the Air Force Mantech Program to enable NCMS to begin the establishment of the center of excellence for advanced flexible manufacturing systems and that the above-mentioned $2.9 million included in the Senate bill for the Navy Mantech Program be made available to the Air Force Mantech Program to permit it to increase its matching transfers to the NCMS for the purposes already stated.

I would be very appreciative if I could secure from both the distinguished chairman and the ranking minority member some assurances that they would work with me to see if a workable solution to the problem could be arranged in conference, which would be based on this emerging new avenue of approach.

Mr. INOUYE. I would be glad to work with the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee and President pro tempore in considering this matter in conference.

Mr. STEVENS. I would be happy to cooperate with the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee and President pro tempore in considering this matter in conference.

MEDICAL FOLLOW-UP AGENCY APPROPRIATION

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I would like to discuss with the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense, Mr. INOUYE, the issue of funding for the Medical Follow-Up Agency [MFUA] of the National Academy of Sciences. I note that I discussed this issue with the chairperson of the Appropriations Subcommittee on VA, HUD, and Independent Agencies, Ms. MIKULSKI, on September 19, 1989, during the consideration of S. 2916, the fiscal year 1990 appropriations bill for these agencies.

This Agency was created more than 40 years ago in order to conduct long-term clinical research and collect health-related data on war veterans. In addition to its epidemiologic research which has contributed to medical knowledge in a number of different areas, MFUA has developed resources which include access to, and familiarity with, the service and medical records of all three armed services as well as of VA. MFUA's capabilities in this regard are unique, which increases the importance of its comprehensive data.

In prior years, MFUA received a small amount of annual core funding to maintain its ongoing activities. However, for the past several years MFUA has been supported solely through individual projects. This loss of core funding has reduced MFUA's capacities to carry out its mission and is threatening its every existence.

On February 2, 1989, I wrote to VA's Chief Medical Director [CMD], NIH's Director, and DOD's Assistant Secretary for Health Affairs, urging that they provide a proportionate share of $500,000 per year for a 5-year period for core funding for MFUA and a proportionate share of $100,000 to support a search for a new physician-epidemiologist as Director—40 percent from both VA and DOD and 20 percent from NIH.

Although Dr. Wyngaarden, then NIH Director responded that NIH would be willing to participate in further discussions regarding MFUA's future, both Dr. Gronvall, VA's CMD, and Dr. Mayer, then DOD's Assistant Secretary for Health Affairs, indicated that resources were not available for this purpose. The texts of these letters were printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my discussion with Senator MIKULSKI on September 19, 1989 (S11371).

Mr. President, as the Senator from Hawaii is aware, in a June 7, 1989, letter, I urged him and the chairs of the full Appropriations Committee, the Subcommittee on VA, HUD, and Independent Agencies, and the Subcommittee on Labor, Health and Human Services, Education, and Related Agencies to develop a proposal under which VA, DOD, and HHS would fund the MFUA at a level of approximately $500,000 for fiscal year 1990 and annually thereafter for 4 years. The text of this letter was also printed in the RECORD on September 19, 1989 (S11372), following the responses from the involved agencies to my February 2 letter.

Mr. President, in the Appropriations Committee's report on the proposed fiscal year 1990 Departments of Labor, Health and Human Services, Education, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act, the committee stated that it "requests that NIH take the lead in working with the Department of Defense [DOD] and the Veterans' Administration—[VA] by providing Federal funding of $700,000" for the support of the MFUA. The committee further stated that it would not expect NIH to make a contribution unless it were generously matched by DOD and VA.

Mr. President, Senator MIKULSKI and I will be writing a letter to Secretary Derwinski encouraging VA to provide funds to match such an NIH contribution. I would like to request that Senator INOUYE write to Defense Secretary Cheney to urge DOD to evaluate the role of MFUA in its health-research programs and, if appropriate, provide funds to match an NIH contribution as well.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I want to assure my good friend, the senior Senator from California, that I have been and continue to be a staunch supporter of health activities in the Department of Defense. I also believe it is important to fully understand the Medical Follow-Up Agency's [MFUA's] contributions for enhancing DOD health research.

While contributions of MFUA may enhance the wealth of medical knowledge of certain diseases, I would like DOD to assess the degree to which MFUA can augment the medical research already ongoing within the Department. In order to initiate this assessment, I will send a separate letter to the Department of Defense requesting an evaluation of the mission of MFUA. My letter would be written with a view toward urging the DOD to consider joining the NIH in contributing funds for MFUA's support and the search for a highly qualified director if a jointly funded program is militarily justified.

THERMIONIC SPACE POWER SYSTEMS

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I would like to take a moment to discuss a matter of great concern to me with the distinguished chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee. Specifically, I would like to see the Senate improve upon the House position on advanced spacecraft technology. As I am sure the chairman knows, the House directed the Air Force to allocate $10 million for thermionic space power.

Unfortunately, the House did not add the necessary funds to the applicable line in the House report. I am concerned that without such a designation the Air Force will not follow the directions in the report or will take the funds from inappropriate accounts. Accordingly, I would not only simply urge the chairman to agree with the House that $10 million needs to be spent for thermionic space power research but also to add the funds to the appropriate account. Mr. President, let me just just one moment to expand upon the program.

Over the last 2 years, the Air Force has been examining the strategically serious problem of the vulnerability of high-value military satellites. The solar power systems have been identified as a major week point because of the large areas of the arrays required for spacecraft that need more than about 5 kilowatts. The solar arrays complicate the maneuverability of the spacecraft and I understand that techniques to harden solar panels are relatively limited.

Air Force studies have shown a great deal of promise for a very compact thermionic power system. The majority of the requirement is in the 5- to 50-kilowatt range. The entire power system would be about the size of a household trash can and can be adequately hardened.

The results of the Air Force studies were not available when they submitted their budget request. In my judgment, it is important for work in this type of technology to begin without further delay; $10 million was added to the Air Force Program called advanced spacecraft technology in the House authorization bill. While this provision was not included in the Senate authorization bill, I understand that the matter has been agreed to in conference and that the $10 million for thermionic space power will be authorized. These funds would be used to initiate a program managed by the Air Force Space Technology Center. This seed money would pave the way for a joint program with the Department of Energy that makes these vital power systems available. I understand that the Soviet Union is currently using similar power systems on their satellites.

The House Appropriations Committee directed the Air Force to allocate at least $10 million to this effort from within available research and development funds. I believe we should take the initiative by including the funds in the appropriate account for the program in order to ensure that this important initiative gets off to good start.

Mr. President, I would simply ask my good friend from Hawaii, the chairman of the subcommittee, if he will consider my request when he goes to conference with the House.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I am aware of this program. I also fully understand the need for efficient and effective means of generating power in space, particularly with regard to important military satellites. In that regard, I would be pleased to consider the request for the Senator from Alabama. In addition, I will work with him to try to accomplish his request.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I think my good friend, the distinguished Senator from Hawaii and chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee. With that assurance, I feel very confident that this important space power research program will get every possile consideration in the conference on this bill with the House.

ADVANCED LAUNCH SYSTEM

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I would like to take a moment to discuss a matter of great importance and concern to me with the chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, the distinguished Senator from Hawaii. This is the matter of the funding in the Defense appropriations bill for the advanced launch system [ALS].

As my friend knows, this is a joint DOD/NASA program. According to the ALS Report to Congress of January 4, 1988, which was signed by then-President Ronald Reagan, overall management responsibility and funding of this program is assigned to a joint DOD/NASA Program Office. The Program Office has a DOD director and a NASA deputy director. However, the management responsibility for the propulsion systems was assigned to NASA.

Mr. President, this program management plan was the result of considerable negotiations and compromise between DOD, NASA, and the Congress. The program was initiated by the urgent supplemental appropriations bill for fiscal year 1987, now Public Law 100-71, and the report for that bill required the report to Congress. The law actually required the transfer of ALS propulsion research and development funds to NASA and stipulated the exact amount. The Congress took this position with regard to NASA for one reason—it wanted to ensure that the more than 30 years of NASA expertise the country had built in rocket propulsion technology would be used effectively in a joint ALS Program.

Air Force expertise in liquid rocket propulsion pales in comparison to the demonstrated track record of NASA over the past 30 years. In my judgment, it made absolutely no sense to fund the ALS Program and duplicate propulsion efforts in one part of the Government, when another part of the Government already had that expertise. Congress recognized this and wisely required that this very important program be a joint DOD/NASA program fully utilizing capabilities from both agencies with the goal of meeting foreseeable requirements of both military and civilian space programs.

Each Defense appropriations bill since the fiscal year 1987 supplemental appropriations bill has required in bill language that the transfer for propulsion technology be made and stipulated the exact amount. This has, in the past, been a strongly held position of the Senate Appropriations Committee. In fact, this was the only earmarking for SDI funding that survived the conference of last year's Defense appropriations bill. However, this bill does not address the transfer to NASA for its portion of the ALS Program as it has in the past. Could the chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee explain the reason the subcommittee did not include a similar provision in this year's bill?

Mr. INOUYE. I thank the Senator from Alabama for raising this issue and I fully understand the history behind this program and the Senator's interest in it.

The subcommittee did not include this transfer as it has in the past for several reasons. First, this program has been moving along under the joint Program Office for at least 2 years, and the subcommittee feels confident that DOD and NASA are comfortable with the division of work. Second, the subcommittee has studied this program very carefully and finds no reason to believe that the Air Force will not make the transfer to NASA for its portion of the program. I understand this amount to be about $100 million to maintain ongoing research in this very important technology. However, the subcommittee continues to oversee this program in order to insure that it continues to be managed according to the January 4, 1988, ALS Report to Congress, and that NASA is not shortchanged in the process.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank the distinguished Senator. With regard to the transfer, can the chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee give this Senator an assurance that if the subcommittee finds that the Air Force is not forthcoming with this transfer to NASA to properly conduct the propulsion portion of this program, the subcommittee would be willing to take appropriate steps to try to correct the situation?

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, let me assure the Senator from Alabama that the subcommittee will continue to follow this matter with great interest. If the subcommittee finds that the Air Force does not provide for an expeditious transfer to NASA for its portion of this program, the subcommittee would be willing to take appropriate action to correct the situation and to insure that this program is properly managed as traditionally intended by the Congress. I will be happy to work with the senior Senator from Alabama toward that goal.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Hawaii and chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee. With that assurance, I feel confident that this program will continue as planned and that NASA will receive the funding it needs to manage the propulsion portion of this important defense and civilian program.

NONACOUSTIC ASW RESEARCH

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I would like to engage the chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee in a brief discussion concerning an R&D funding issue of potential importance to our national weapons laboratories.

Mr. Chairman, the House Defense appropriations bill added $28 million to fund research in nonacoustic antisubmarine welfare [ASW] to be used in support of a cooperative venture between the Department of Defense and a Department of Energy national laboratory. No funds were requested in the President's budget for this purpose, and none are provided in the bill we are considering today. If funds for a cooperative research program are approved in conference and the Defense Advanced Research Project Agency, or DARPA, begins a program to work with a national laboratory, is it the chairman's intention that his subcommittee be informed well in advance about the initiation of such an effort?

Mr. INOUYE. I thank the Senator from New Mexico for bringing this issue to the attention of the Senate. Our bill has no funds for a cooperative research program in this area. However, my subcommittee is very interested in reviewing and working with DARPA if a DOD-DOE program in this area is initiated.

Mr. DOMENICI. My concern in this matter is to insure that DARPA examines the prospects for cooperative nonacoustic ASW research available at all three of DOE's national weapons laboratories. I am not suggesting that any one of them—including the two in my State—has a monopoly on expertise in this area, nor am I suggesting that DARPA has already decided to enter into such a venture with any of them. I am strongly urging that all three labs be given an opportunity to demonstrate their resources and propose a cooperative arrangement with DARPA, if DARPA chooses to go this route. Does the chairman agree with this approach?

Mr. INOUYE. I certainly do agree with the Senator from New Mexico, that in considering cooperative arrangements for nonacoustic ASW research between DOD and the DOE weapons labs, DARPA should give full and careful consideration to the merits of each laboratory program. I further would note that the Defense Department also may be in the process of refining its overall approach to research into nonacoustic antisubmarine welfare. I understand that new memorandums of agreement are under discussion among the principal Government organizations involved in this important effort.

The committee believes it would be helpful to receive a full report about the status and conclusions of this refinement process. It would expect such a report to address the cooperative arrangements between DOD and the Energy Department laboratories referred to by my distinguished committee colleague from New Mexico. To ensure that all Energy Department laboratories are given due consideration, as my colleague urges, I would indicate that the Defense Subcommittee expects the Defense Department report will describe fully any proposed cooperative programs. This report should indicate clearly the merits of a DOD-DOE cooperative program in nonacoustic ASW research and the methodology by which programs at the DOE laboratories were reviewed and evaluated.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the chairman for his attention to this matter. I look forward to his assessment of DARPA's plans if funds for a joint DOD-DOE program are approved in conference.

GEOGRAPHIC DIVERSITY IN RESEARCH

Mr. SHELBY. Mr. President, I would like to discuss with the manager of the bill a matter of interest to this Senator, and, I believe, to a number of Senators. It has been brought to my attention that the House Committee report includes a section entitled "Geographic Diversity in Research." This section focuses upon a small program of the National Science Foundation known as the Experimental Program to Stimulate Competitive Research [Epscor]. This program has achieved some significant results in aiding less competitive States to compete more effectively for Federal research grants, and the House report asks DOD for an assessment of the potential for using the Epscor model to help expand our national research and science education base.

I understand that the President's new Science Adviser, Dr. Allan Bromley, commented favorably upon the idea of expanding Epscor to other agencies during his confirmation hearings before the Commerce, Science, and Transportation Committee. In addition, the major higher education associations, including the Association of American Universities, have endorsed this concept. Accordingly, I would ask that the distinguished manager examine this part of the House report carefully in conference and, hopefully, give it favorable consideration.

Mr. INOUYE. I appreciate the Senator's remarks. I do understand that the Epscor Program at NSF has been successful and that it would be well for other departments to consider whether this kind of approach can benefit their own research activities. I can assure the Senator that we will give this matter every consideration during the conference.

Mr. SHELBY. I thank the Senator for his remarks.

RESEARCH, DEVELOPMENT, TEST AND EVALUATION

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I would like to ask my good friend from Hawaii about the Army's $5.3 billion research, development, test and evaluation account and its provision for continuing research into the adaptability of degradable plastics to military product packaging.

We are, in the eighties, a plastic society—we use plastic food packaging, diapers, and even money. This has not come without its cost.

Statistics—and there are a lot of them—document the vast scope of this problem. The average American generates 3.5 pounds of discards each day, or some 1,300 pounds a year. The Environmental Protection Agency estimates that by the year 2000, more than 190 million tons of municipal solid waste will be generated annually in the United States.

There are no quick fix solutions to waste management. The public is very much aware of this and in many locations, is electing officials who support mandatory recycling laws and bans on certain products. Landfills are running out of space to accommodate this tidal wave of trash. Tempers flare as resentment grows in localities, including some in Virginia, at attempts to export trash from other States. Add to that the fact that we also do not have adequate recycling programs or incineration capabilities to answer the problem.

Plastic, because of its high visibility and common use, has come under a more concerted attack.

Plastics account for a steadily increasing proportion of this mountain of waste—2.7 percent in 1970, according to EPA, but an estimated 9.2 percent by the turn of the century.

I say troubling because plastics—packaging wrappers, six-pack rings, carry bags, you name it—are practically indestructible. Left in landfills or dumped into the sea, these products do not degrade, literally, for centuries. Our environment, our wildlife, even ourselves—all are threatened.

Modern science gave us plastic—convenient, lightweight, and long lasting. Luckily, science now is beginning to yield promising solutions to the environmental dangers of the road we as a society are traveling.

From laboratory test tubes have come signs that a blend of plastics and corn starch can produce a material sufficiently durable to be used in, say, a supermarket carry bag, but sufficiently biodegradable to be much more environmentally sound.

Forward-thinking commercial enterprises have already begun to use such bags, but the Federal Government certainly has an obligation to be in the forefront of environmental solutions.

To that end, during committee consideration of the DOD authorization bill, I recently introduced an amendment encouraging the military to step up significantly its use of biodegradable products.

The Defense Department has almost unlimited potential to become an environmental leader. The Pentagon buys more than 400 million plastic trash bags a year. Army commissaries alone use more than 95 million plastic grocery bags annually.

Under my amendment, which subsequently passed the Senate, the Pentagon would allot 10 percent of its bag purchases to biodegradables as these products become available to the Federal Government. If there are no problems with the purchases, the percentage would rise by 5 percent a year, to a maximum of 30 percent.

Purchase of biodegradables carry bags for military commissaries and exchanges, as well as waste recycling on military installations, also would be encouraged.

On a related point, the DOD authorization bill also orders the Defense Department to study ways to substitute other compounds, where possible, for chlorofluorocarbons [CFC's], which have been identified as a major cause of harmful ozone depletion in the atmosphere.

If we hope to eliminate ozone-depleting substances from military uses, those uses must first be identified by listing all DOD military specifications that directly and indirectly required the use of CFC's. Our CFC provision in title III of the DOD authorization bill requires that those lists be completed within 9 months of enactment.

Based on the findings of such a list, DOD will work with an advisory committee comprised of representatives from DOD, the Environmental Protection Agency and manufacturers of military products manufactured with CFC's to identify processes and specifications where available CFC alternatives can be substituted safety and expeditiously.

Given our present understanding of the adverse environmental impact CFC's have on the Earth's ozone layer, it is essential that DOD, in concert with its suppliers, reduce its use and change requirements to use CFC's in those areas where safe substitutes have been made available. At the same time, it is crucial to our national defense interest to maintain the highest product quality as well as an adequate supply of essential parts and materials to the military.

Mr. President, today, degradable plastics research is a reality. The Department of Defense, at its U.S. Army Natick Research, Development, and Engineering Center at Natick, MA, has been conducting significant research into the application of degradable packaging materials to military rations. Use of such materials has the potential of minimizing the problem of waste disposal on land and at sea. Research to date has:

Helped determine the potential usefulness of degradable bags in the extreme climatic conditions in which military forces are sometimes required to operate;

Determined which types of degradable films deteriorate most quickly in water and soil;

Determined which degradable films are thick enough to be heated sealed into a food pouch, yet thin enough to quickly degrade; and Provided pertinent information to the Hazardous Materials Technical Center [HMTC] for a state-of-the-art report on biodegradable plastics.

Continued support by the Congress will allow this fine institution to continue its work on a variety of other projects, including:

Continued research on new types of degradable materials to test their use in ration packaging designs;

Closely monitoring industrial proposals to FDA for use of degradable plastics in direct food contact packaging;

Testing the physical properties of degradable plastics such as impact, tensile and tear strength, and the barrier properties necessary for food preservation and comparing these properties to their nondegradable counterparts;

Determining shelf life of degradable packages by running long-term storage study of rations under various climatic conditions;

Continuing soil burial testing of degradable materials to examine rates of degradation and the effects it has on the integrity of the packaging material; and

Continuing to provide data and necessary support to other organizations involved in degradable plastics research.

Today, we are nearing capacity in our ability to dispose of our Nation's wastes. The new frontiers lie in our technological prowess, and our willingness to care for and respect the environment which will be the most important inheritance we can pass on to our children and future generations.

Degradable plastics are not the only answer to the Nation's environmental ills, but they can make a significant contribution.

Knowledge is the key. Knowledge on how fast degradable plastics decompose in landfills and at sea. Knowledge on what if anything the environment side effects might be from decomposing plastics. And, knowledge on how degradable plastics could affect efforts to recycle waste products.

I would ask my very good friend from Hawaii if he can assure me that the DOD appropriations we are considering today will allow this important research to continue, and if so that the conference report on this bill will reflect that fact?

Mr. INOUYE. I say to my good friend from Virginia that I can give him those assurances.

SOLID ROCKET MOTOR DEMILITARIZATION

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. President, the Senate Armed Services Committee authorized appropriations of up to $6 million in fiscal year 1990 for research in environmentally acceptable methods of solid rocket motor demilitarization. This issue came to my attention last year during a dispute between the Department of the Army and the Colorado Department of Health concerning the environmental and public safety impact of open detonation at the Pueblo Army Depot in Pueblo, CO, of Pershing rocket motors being disposed of under the terms of the INF Treaty. In the course of resolving that dispute, it became clear that there are no readily available technologies for mitigating the environmental damage caused by the static firing of rocket motors.

Earlier this year, I asked the Department of Defense what research is being conducted in this area, and found that very little is in fact being done. Future arms control treaties will likely require the destruction of even greater numbers of missiles—and we are doing very little to prepare us for this responsibility.

This problem is real, Mr. President, yet there is no focused effort within DOD to address this problem, there is very little investment in the relevant technologies, and there is little appreciation of the potential impact of State and Federal environmental regulations on our arms control flexibility in this area. I might add that the development of environmentally benign rocket motor destruction techniques is of great potential application also to contractors who test rocket motors in areas where there are strict limits on atmospheric effluents.

The Senate Armed Services Committee recognized this problem in its report and created a new program under the direction of the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Research and Engineering to consolidate research efforts to identify cost-effective and environmentally benign alternatives to open detonation. The committee's report noted:

The Committee believes that the DOD is directing insufficient attention to R&D activities for the demilitarization of solid propellant rocket motors of all types in an environmentally benign manner. The current approach, open detonation or static firing, is not an environmentally acceptable approach to demilitarize these solid propellant rocket motors; however, no other environmentally acceptable approach has been demonstrated. The Committee is aware of alternate technologies that are being investigated at a moderate level of effort by the military services which may provide the desired capability. The Committee believes that these efforts should be coordinated and given overall management by the Director, Defense Research & Engineering [DDR&E]. The Committee directs the Director to establish a consolidated, environmentally benign, solid rocket demilitarization research and development program and, to implement this activity, adds $6 million and $7.5 million to the amended defense budget requests for fiscal years 1990 and 1991, respectively.

This program is necessary and important, Mr. President, and it will not occur if we do not make it happen. In a shrinking defense budget, environmental and arms control concerns such as this are unlikely to be fully appreciated without our direction, and for this reason I am disappointed that the Defense Subcommittee of the Senate Appropriations Committee declined to fund this program.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I have reviewed the proposal discussed by the Senator from Colorado and agree with him that there is a legitimate need to proceed with a research program for cost-effective, environmentally acceptable alternatives to the present destruction method of static firing. We do not disagree on the need for this program. I do believe, however, that greater definition of the scope and nature of the proposed effort is necessary before we can commit specific program funding. I also have been informed that the Department has yet to conclude its examination of the possible alternative solutions to this problem, and is only beginning to create a multiservice and civilian management structure to implement any proposed solutions. These important tasks need to be completed so Congress can be confident that the taxpayers' investment will be effectively expended.

I would suggest, Mr. President, that we direct the Director of Defense Research and Engineering to submit to Congress the results of a study on large rocket motor demilitarization by March 1. I would expect this report also to outline the full extent of the problem and to include technological approaches for environmentally benign disposal, and an investment strategy to develop the most cost-effective technology alternatives. This study should also address the impact of current arms negotiations on this issue, and indicate how the proposed research effort relates to our specific arms control negotiating positions and the likely timeframes for implementing the expected agreements which would require disposal of solid rocket motors. The Department also should report on how the executive branch is ensuring that our arms control negotiators and negotiating positions are coordinated fully with the technologists and operations personnel who will be responsible for developing and implementing any new technologies required for U.S. compliance with likely arms agreements.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished manager of the bill, the senior Senator from Hawaii, for his understanding. I welcome his suggestion that a report be submitted to Congress by March 1, 1990, but remain concerned that we begin work in this area as soon as practicable. How does the Senator propose to fund this activity, assuming the Department sends a report to us next March which clearly outlines a coherent and time-sensitive requirement?

Mr. INOUYE. Depending on the outcome of the report to the committees, and on the Defense Department's ability to efficiently obligate and expend any funds in fiscal 1990, I would consider a strong letter to the Secretary of Defense urging him to provide modest funding under his "below threshold reprogramming" authority. I have been informed that the Department would not be able to effectively use any funds for this effort until late fiscal 1990 in any case. I would hope that the Secretary will be sensitive to our concerns should any fiscal 1990 funding be required.

Mr. WIRTH. I thank the distinguished chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee for his understanding and support of this issue, and look forward to working with him on this matter.

THE FUTURE OF U.S. DEFENSE: SPACE BASED WIDE AREA SURVEILLANCE

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, in this year's budget, the administration requested funding for a new program to develop a capability that would be as revolutionary today as the radar was during World War II, but one based in space. It's called a space-based wide area surveillance system, and let me explain for my colleagues briefly a few of the capabilities of this new system:

A wide area surveillance system, based in space, will represent a huge leap forward in the U.S. military's ability to track aircraft and cruise missiles around the globe. Currently, our best system is the airborne AWACS, but it is only able to cover very small areas of the globe at any one time. This revolutionary space-based system, I am told by the Defense Department, will give us an ability for round-the-world coverage of flying aircraft every 15 minutes.

A wide area surveillance system, functioning much like our eyes in space, will greatly enhance our protection of carrier battle groups, increase the accuracy of military airlift and airdrop missions, and virtually eliminate "Plausible Denial" by our enemies: such as Qadhafi's denial of Libyan involvement in air raids on Khartoum, Sudan.

Of special importance, a space-based wide area surveillance system will be a major benefit to our drug interdiction efforts. It is envisioned as a system that will be able, once developed, to constantly monitor airborne aircraft, giving us a 95 percent probability of detection of planes traveling the normal inbound course for drug-runners within 6 minutes of lift-off. Imagine that! With cocaine use in the United States skyrocketing, a system like this is absolutely essential.

Unfortunately, this exceptional system might never make it off the drawing boards. Both the House and the Senate have eliminated all funding for completion of the first phase of research on a space-based wide area surveillance system.

It has come to my attention that canceling all funding would prevent further study of the merits of the system, making the required December 1989 Defense Advisory Board decision absolutely impossible. The Defense Department relates that they need at least $5 million to be set aside in the Air Force budget to complete the review required by the Senate.

I think we should fund the President's entire request on this system. If not, it certainly seems a bit shortsighted to not even include the $5 million necessary to complete the studies required by Congress. I urge the committee to reexamine funding for the space based wide area surveillance system, and especially reconsider the $5 million necessary for the next few months of study.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I would be happy to yield to my distinguished colleague from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I must agree with my colleague that the time has come for the United States to begin investing in a space-based wide area surveillance system. Never before has the need for such a system been so great. In addition to our traditional national security needs, we now find ourselves under virtual attack by aircraft entering our airspace carrying cocaine. The surveillance satellites that will be a part of this program will not only provide great benefit to our military commanders in a conventional battle, they will also be a major contributor in our war on drugs.

The Defense Department intentionally established separate funding lines in the Air Force and the Navy to support concept exploration for alternate technologies. That's not a duplication of effort as many assert. It looks to me more like free market competition, the foundation of our economy. Such an arrangement appears prudent, especially in the preliminary stages of a program that will eventually be as important as this one will be.

I must agree with my distinguished colleague from Colorado: This decision needs to be looked at again in conference. It just doesn't make sense to eliminate funding for the very study we cite as a requirement for an informed decision by Congress.

I hope my colleagues on the Appropriations Committee will look carefully at this in conference.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I thank my friend from Idaho for his insightful remarks. Would the distinguished Senator from Alaska agree to look at this again in conference?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I would be happy to take another look at the Defense Department's request for $5 million for the space-based wide area surveillance system during the conference on the bill.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Alaska for his kind consideration of our request.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I rise to comment on the final passage of the fiscal year 1990 Department of Defense appropriations bill. As is the usual practice in this body and with this bill, there were several hard-fought and hotly contested issues that I and my esteemed colleagues had to resolve.

I won't take the time at this late hour to express my views on the many individual issues on which the U.S. Senate has voted. I do, however, wish to clarify a vote I cast on September 26.

Mr. President, as you will recall, on September 26, the Senate voted for a $8.49 billion amendment, proposed by Senators Wallop and Warner, to an Appropriations Committee amendment that funded several, major defense programs. That amendment, which I supported, deleted excessive and unrequested funding for Navy sealift, restored funding for Trident D-5 SLBM's; increased funding for space-based wide area surveillance radar; and increased funding for a number of conventional weapons programs as well as affected several other programs.

I supported each of those elements in the package amendment. In this $8.49 billion package, there was also a provision to slightly increase SDI funding. In many media reports, however, that complex package was portrayed as a simple "yes or no" vote on only the SDI element of the package. Not coincidentally, that is also the way the opponents of the amendment attempted to portray it.

Many Senators, myself included, would likely have voted differently if each of the programs in the package were presented individually. In this particular case, they were not, leaving no option but to vote yes or no on the whole amendment.

Regarding the SDI funding increase, had that issue been presented separately, I and others would have voted against it. However, the other elements of the program, as noted above, were sufficiently important and worthy of my support. Therefore, I voted for the overall package.

I am pleased, Mr. President, that the Senate has had today, the opportunity to vote directly on the SDI funding issue. And today, the relevant amendment was in fact a straight "yes and no" on increasing SDI funding by $600 million. As I have in the past, I opposed this latest effort to significantly increase SDI funding.

Mr. President, I have a number of reservations about this bill. I believe it fails to make the most of our defense dollars. I also have a number of strong objections to the bill sent over to us by the House. But I do believe that the likely result of its passage will be a conference report that will strike a proper balance between national security and budgetary responsibility. I will therefore vote for passage of this appropriations bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment of the amendments and third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read a third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read a third time, the question is, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN] is necessarily absent.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. JEFFORDS] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 96, nays 2, as follows:

NATIONAL ALZHEIMER'S DISEASE MONTH

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I want to thank my colleagues for passing Senate Joint Resolution 16 which designates the month of November 1989 as "National Alzheimer's Disease Month." The month of November is associated with efforts to increase public awareness about Alzheimer's disease and its effect on victims, families, caregivers, and society.

Currently more than 4 million people suffer from Alzheimer's disease. Alzheimer's, because of its correlation with aging, presents a serious social and economic challenge for America. Every effort must be made to stem the tide of this tragic disease. Awareness through education and experience with someone who has Alzheimer's is an important contribution. Setting aside 1 month to emphasize the tragic effects of Alzheimer's can do much to place Alzheimer's disease higher on the American agenda.

I call on all Americans to join with me and the thousands of dedicated volunteers, caregivers, and researchers in helping society understand the extensiveness of Alzheimer's and its economic cost to society. I want to thank the Alzheimer's Disease and Related Disorders Association and the American Health Assistance Foundation for their efforts to secure passage of this resolution.

Mr. President, I believe that Federal and private funding for Alzheimer's research has been extremely helpful in our understanding the cause of Alzheimer's. However, further funds are critical in order to expedite a discovery of the cause and treatment for Alzheimer's. To that end, I ask my distinguished colleagues to join me and Senators HATFIELD, COCHRAN, and D'AMATO to secure the passage of S. 1321, "Comprehensive Alzheimer's Assistance, Research and Education Act of 1989 [CARE]." That legislation would ensure continued assistance for education, research, and treatment programs related to Alzheimer's.

As we work to increase Federal support, I encourage all organizations involved with Alzheimer's disease to increase their public education efforts and support for victims and caregivers. Our labors will produce results and bring comfort to those affected by Alzheimer's. I ask unanimous consent that one of many letters I have received on this topic be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEAR SENATOR PRESSLER: Saturday while I was reading our local newspaper, I saw an article about your effort to find a cure for Alzheimer's. As I am very familiar with this terrible disease, I was so glad when I saw that someone besides the late Congressman Pepper is concerned to find a cure for this illness. My father also suffered from Alzheimer's. He was a brilliant attorney and a professor of law originally in our native Cuba and after Castro at the Inter-American University in San Juan, Puerto Rico. It was terribly sad to see that intellect being destroyed. For over ten years he suffered with the disease and the last eight in bed. Only a dedicated wife as my mother, with love and affection took care of such a situation. He finally passed away last summer. At that time, my mother's health deteriorated so much that we almost lost her too.

I sympathize very much with you, your father and family. My best wishes on your crusade. You are doing something great.

RURAL REFERRAL CENTERS, FISCAL YEAR 1990 CONTINUING RESOLUTION

Mr. NICKLES. I would like to enter into a colloquy with the chairman and ranking member of the Labor, HHS Appropriations Subcommittee on behalf of myself and Senator McCLURE in regard to the status of rural referral centers in our respective States.

We would like to bring to the attention of the chairman of the Labor, Health and Human Services Subcommittee, as well as the ranking member, the situation which will affect several rural referral centers across the Nation. Rural referral centers are designated hospitals which are reimbursed by Medicare at a rate which falls between that of rural and urban hospitals. These rural referral centers provide valuable service to rural areas by increasing access to quality health care services.

The committee included provisions in the fiscal year 1990 Labor, Health and Human Services appropriations bill which would extend the current status of rural referral centers for 1 year. However, the problem is that several rural referral centers have an October 1 reporting requirement and thus until the Labor, HHS appropriations bill becomes effective, these centers could lose their rural referral center status and their higher level of reimbursement. For those affected, losing that status for even a short period of time could be financially devastating. For these reasons, I seek on behalf of myself and Senator McCLURE that the chairman and ranking member comment on a procedure to retain the status of these centers until the appropriations bill has become law.

Mr. HARKIN. The Senator from Oklahoma raises an important point. The ranking member and I agree that this would create a burden upon several hospitals and agree to provide help to the Senator to relieve this burden.

Mr. NICKLES. I thank the Senator. It is my hope that at this time we can agree that no portion of the sums appropriated under House Joint Resolution 407, the continuing resolution, be used to implement the prospective payment system regulation provision relating to the classification of rural referral centers, in order to protect RRC status until further action is taken by Congress.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, as chairman of the Labor, HHS Appropriations Subcommittee, I can state that the position outlined by the Senator from Oklahoma is our position. The Labor, HHS appropriations bill (H.R. 2990) contains provisions relating to rural referral centers and it would be inappropriate for a change in the status of a rural referral center to occur between now and the time H.R. 2990 becomes law. Ultimately, I hope that this issue will be resolved favorably as part of the reconciliation bill.

Mr. SPECTER. As ranking member of the Labor, HHS Appropriations Subcommittee, I concur with the remarks of the chairman with respect to the concerns and position expressed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

REMARKS OF THE PRESIDENT OF COLOMBIA, DR. VIRGILIO BARCO

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, on behalf of the Republican leader and myself I wish to place into the RECORD the remarks which the President of Colombia, Dr. Virgilio Barco, presented today in a meeting with our Senate colleagues.

President Barco gave us a firsthand assessment of the tragic events that have occurred in his country. The President and the people of Colombia are waging a valiant frontline battle against the international drug traffickers and they deserve our steadfast support and gratitude. It is through the example of the courageous leadership of President Barco and his government that we can hope to successfully confront and ultimately win the war on drugs.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF DR. VIRGILIO BARCO AT CONGRESSIONAL MEETING

Mr. Majority Leader; Mr. Minority Leader: I want to thank you for inviting me here this afternoon on such short notice. I hope we can have a more informal discussion, but if I may make some brief remarks on the issues I intend to discuss with President Bush tonight and at the United Nations tomorrow.

Let me begin by thanking many of you for the personal support you have provided us. At a critical time in this struggle, I received a letter from Senator Specter and 15 of your colleagues expressing support. It was front page news in our newspapers, and it has helped to strengthen the resolve of our people.

Over the years, many of your allies have come to this city to report from the frontline. Here, there are no apparent signs of the scars and horrors of war—no gutted buildings, no curfews, no troops on the street.

Winston Churchill must have been struck by the same thing, and by the same challenge I face—how to communicate the toll of being on the frontline. It has always been a measure of this city's greatness that despite its detachment, your leaders understood.

This afternoon, I am here to tell you of a war that is much closer to home—a war that has reached deep into the streets of Washington and every other city in this country.

Of course, I am talking about illegal narcotics, and the insidious effects their trade has on both our countries.

As all of you know, my country is at war. And I come here, as an ally in an earlier war might have done, to warn you of what you may not yet fully see. Both my government and yours have steadily escalated our efforts to combat the global criminal enterprise of narcotics. It has absorbed evermore attention and resources from both our governments. We understand that we can only win this war together.

In recent weeks, however, the final hope that this could be dealt with as a traditional, if severe, law and order problem has been removed.

All of you know the sacrifices many Colombians have made—and are willing to continue to make—in this war. I will not spend time to enumerate the countless acts of heroism here.

But you should understand what my country is going through now.

Six weeks ago, Luis Carlos Galan, a leading presidential candidate and an outstanding figure in our new generation of political leaders, was gunned down by the cartels for continuing to speak out against them.

He was shot as I was preparing to speak to the nation to announce that I would employ the powers available to me under the state of seige to begin mass seizures of suspects, property and equipment. Despite the fact that my address was given under the shadow of this tragic act, the cartels failed if their intention was to intimidate. Yes, we all felt the pain and the loss; just as when your young leaders, Martin Luther King and Robert F. Kennedy, were killed—and Americans were brought together. So it was that Colombians too felt the shock. Galan still had so much to give, so much to do.

Yet in his death lies part of his political testament. He has united us. Colombians are determined to rid themselves of these murderers. These men who would turn Latin America's oldest democracy and soundest economy into their private killing fields. But tomorrow at the U.N. they will hear me well—they will fail. In the end, we will prevail.

Now, let me be specific and tell you what we need to win the war—and what we do not need.

The speed with which the United States provided assistance is greatly appreciated. I have been regularly in touch with President Bush and many of you, and I want to thank you again for your support. Your action yesterday in passing the Drug Bill moves us another step forward.

Tomorrow, I will raise a number of specific issues which demand immediate international actions. They include stopping the supply of chemicals which are required to produce cocaine—most of which comes from the United States and Europe. I will discuss the need to control money laundering where we simply must have a high level of international cooperation. I will discuss the collapse of the International Coffee Agreement which will cost Colombia $400 million in income this year, and the need to support legitimate economic development if we are to have any hope of stopping illegal economies like narcotics.

But I do not want to use this opportunity to speak to you primarily of coffee or helicopters. Both have their part in an anti-narcotics strategy. Neither, however, is the decisive weapon in winning this war. Rather, the key is for all of you here today to acknowledge that the United States, like Colombia, is at war.

The single most important thing you can do for us—and for yourselves—is to reduce consumption of these drugs. As long as the demand is there, even if we rid Colombia of the cartels, they will just move on to somewhere else. The profits are too great. The only law the cartels respect is the law of supply and demand.

You cannot rely on persuasion alone to curb demand for narcotics. However powerful the appeal to the individual conscience, it cannot root out the drug habit which is now so deeply sewn into the fabric of your neighborhoods. It must be brought home to every user of narcotics, however ingrained or casual his or her habit, that use is a crime. It is a crime that must be punished. Deterrence must join choice as the impulse for saying "NO."

The reason I presume to make such a direct appeal to you is that we believe that each user, however much an innocent personal choice he or she may consider their habit, is funding the killing of Colombian officials who seek to uphold the law. Their habit is the trigger finger. And, as you know, far more than half the world's illegal cocaine is consumed in the United States.

Another issue is important to understand here. While demand for narcotics lies at the heart of the crisis, America must also examine its role in the violence this illegal trade spawns. The weapons used by the cartels to intimidate, maim, and kill my people do not come from Colombia. They are legally and easily bought in an international market and most of these weapons originate here in the United States.

Make no mistake, those who support this arms market, those who advocate the free sale of arms, are no different from the addicts whose demand fuels this violence. Each one of us, and every nation, has a moral obligation to stop this madness and stop it now.

We also view with extreme seriousness the activities of foreign mercenaries in training and assisting narco-terrorists in Colombia. We have not only condemned their presence, we have also criminalized their activities and ordered their capture. Tomorrow, I will be asking the United Nations to approve a Convention outlawing these activities.

Last, let me touch on what we do not need. There has been much discussion of sending troops to Colombia. We do not want or need troops from the United States, or any other foreign country. President Bush understands this. I hope you will understand that we take pride in our professional army and police which are under civilian control and which must have responsibility for law enforcement and the protection of our national security.

We understand how difficult it is to reduce demand quickly. We understand that there are deep-rooted social problems and cases of individual addiction that cannot be solved overnight. But unless you mobilize to fight an intensive internal campaign against narcotics demand you leave us out on a limb and indeed may never succeed in ending the scourge of drug use.

I hope you understand my need for speaking in blunt terms this afternoon. We truly do appreciate your support, but we have a long way to go in this battle. Together, if we can mobilize international action, I know we will prevail.

Thank you so much for your time.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM-328. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Finance.

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 49

"Whereas, In enacting Section 89 of the Internal Revenue Code, Congress intended to encourage employers offering accident or health plans or group-term life insurance to provide those benefits to a broad range of employees; and

"Whereas, Section 89 of the Internal Revenue Code imposes complex new nondiscrimination rules and qualification standards which require public school districts to incur great effort and expense to implement; and

"Whereas, The utility of applying Section 89 of the Internal Revenue Code to public school districts is far exceeded by the compliance burden imposed; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact legislation amending Section 89 of the Internal Revenue Code so as to exclude public school districts from the requirements of that section; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-329. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 39

"Whereas, The Immigration and Reform and Control Act (IRCA), which brought the most sweeping change in United States Immigration laws for the last 30 years was signed into law on November 6, 1986 (Public Law 99-603); and

"Whereas, IRCA has two major provisions: sanctions against employers who knowingly hire undocumented workers; and legalization of undocumented residents who can establish continuous residency in the United States since 1982 and satisfy a number of the other eligibility requirements; and

"Whereas, IRCA also established the State Legalization Impact-Assistance Grants Program to provide, for four fiscal years, grants to states to pay for classes in English and United States history and government and for health and other services for immigrants seeking to legalize their status through the amnesty program; and

"Whereas, Various proposals are pending in Congress, including the rescinding of $600,000,000 of that appropriation in order to reduce the general deficit or for other general purposes, the diversion and reallocation of $200,000,000 thereof and a temporary loan of $100,000,000 from the State Legalization Impact-Assistance Grants Program Fund to assist in the resettlement of an unanticipated surge of refugees from the Soviet Union; and

"Whereas, Any apparent surplus in those funds is illusory in that the delay in spending the appropriated funds derives not from a lack of demand or need for the funded services, but rather from administratively delayed implementation of the program at both the federal and state levels which have resulted in the program being a year behind schedule in certain parts of the country and from undue and attenuated claims procedures and because of the disbursement of the grants on the basis of reimbursing service providers for past expenditures and services rendered; and

"Whereas, In California the demand for services, especially English and civics classes, has exceeded expectations by 50 percent and more than 150,000 immigrants are on the waiting lists and once the programs in other states are under way similar demands will be likely; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the Congress and the President of the United States to oppose any attempt to diminish or divert any funds currently appropriated for the State Legalization Impact-Assistance Grants Program; and be it futher

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-330. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Oregon; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 26

"Whereas the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon pursuant to Article V of the United States Constitution, hereby ratifies an amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by resolution of the First Congress of the United States in New York, New York, on September 25, 1789, which reads as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two thirds of both Houses concurring, that the following (Article) be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, . . . which (Article), when ratified by three fourths of the said Legislatures, to be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution, viz:

"'Article the second . . . No law, varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives, shall take effect, until an election of Representatives, shall have intervened.'; and

"Whereas the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon acknowledges that the above-quoted Article of Amendment to the United States Constitution has already been ratified by the legislatures of the following states on the dates indicated, to wit: Maryland on December 19, 1789; North Caroliona on December 22, 1789; South Carolina on January 19, 1790; Delaware on January 28, 1790; Vermont on November 3, 1791; Virginia on December 15, 1791; Ohio on May 6, 1873 (70 Ohio Laws 409-10); Wyoming on March 3, 1978 (124 Cong. H827, S2207-8, S2300); Indiana on February 19, 1986 (132 Cong. Rec. H1534, S4663); Utah on February 25, 1986 (132 Cong. Rec. S6750, S7578; 133 Cong. Rec. H9666); Arkansas on March 5, 1987 (134 Cong. Rec. H3721, S7518); Montana on March 11, 1987 (133 Cong. Rec. H1715, S6155); Connecticut on May 13, 1987 (133 Cong. Rec. H7406, S11981); Wisconsin on June 30, 1987 (133 Cong. Rec. H5783, S9939); Iowa on February 7, 1989; and Idaho on March 23, 1989; as well as by the House of Representaitves of the State of North Dakota on January 26, 1987, and on February 3, 1989; the House of Representatives of the State of Texas on April 23, 1987; the House of Representatives of the State of Illinois on June 22, 1988; and the Assembly of the State of Nevada on March 28, 1989; and

"Whereas the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon acknowledges that the above-quoted Article of Amendment to the United States Constitution may still be ratified by states' legislatures as a result of the ruling by the United States Supreme Court in the landmark case of Coleman v. Miller, (307 U.S. 433 (1939)) in which it was opined that Congress is the final arbiter on the question of whether too much time has elapsed between Congress' submission of an amendment and the most recent state legislature's ratification of same if Congress did not specify a deadline on the amendment's consideration; now, therefore,

Be it Resolved by the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon:

"(1) That the Secretary of State shall notify the Archivist of the United States (pursuant to 1 U.S.C. 106b; 1 U.S.C. 112; as amended by P.L. 98-497, 98 Stat. 2291) of the action of the Sixty-fifth Legislative Assembly by sending to the archivist one copy of this resolution.

"(2) That the Secretary of State shall also send one copy of this resolution to each member of the Oregon Congressional Delegation, the Secretary of the United States Senate and the Clerk of the United States House of Representatives with the request that it be printed in full in the Congressional Record."

POM-331. A petition from a citizen of Tustin, California favoring the adoption of a balanced budget constitutional amendment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POM-332. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION NO. 33

"Whereas, The key to successful economic development for California and the nation is the availability of a well-educated, skilled, trained, motivated, and productive work force; and

"Whereas, California has a historic commitment to providing both educational and economic opportunity to the broadest possible segment of the population through a strong system of public and private postsecondary education; and

"Whereas, Equal access to the state's diverse educational offerings in both public and private educational institutions is dependent upon the availability of state and federal financial assistance to those who would otherwise have the resources to attend college or vocational school; and

"Whereas, An integral component of the financial assistance available to the state's postsecondary students are funds provided by the Robert T. Stafford Student Loan Program, a federally guaranteed program under which more than 300,000 California students have borrowed more than five billion dollars ($5,000,000,000) in loans as of 1988, of which amount six hundred and fifty million dollars ($650,000,000) has entered default; and

"Whereas, Of those who default, many do so because they enter programs with insufficient academic preparation, receive inadequate consumer information, receive substandard education and training, and are subsequently unable to obtain gainful employment; and

"Whereas, The state has a fundamental responsibility to ensure adequate consumer protection from substandard educational practices, insufficient disclosure of consumer information, and fraud or misrepresentation in the sale or promotion of educational programs, whether accredited or unaccredited; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California memorializes the President and the Congress of the United States, as part of the reauthorization of the Higher Education Act of 1965, to reconsider and revise as necessary the guidelines for institutional participation and for student eligibility that apply to the granting of student loans under the federal Title IV financial aid programs; and be it further

"Resolved, That eligibility for institutional participation in state and federal financial aid programs should be contingent upon clear evidence that students are benefiting from a quality education that leads to a reasonable likelihood of gainful employment or certification of license in a professional field; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, the Secretary of Education, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-333. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources:

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 9

"Whereas, The federal minimum wage of $3.35 per hour has been in effect since January 1, 1981, and in those eight years the federal minimum wage level has fallen far behind the rate of change in the average wage of workers contrary to the stated intent of Congress; and

"Whereas, The purchasing power of the federal minimum wage has fallen to its lowest level since 1955 with today's minimum wage equaling only $2.46 per hour in inflation-adjusted 1981 dollars; and

"Whereas, A full-time worker paid the federal minimum wage would earn only $6,700 per year (at 40 hours a week for 50 weeks), an amount that is $2,500 a year less than what it takes to support a family of three at the official poverty level; and

"Whereas, The overwhelming percentage of people earning wages at or around the federal minimum are adults, nearly half of whom are heads of households; and

"Whereas, Federal action to increase the national minimum wage floor would greatly decrease the disparity of minimum wage levels among the various states; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the President and the Congress of the United States to take immediate steps to raise the federal minimum wage level to a level not lower than that recently adopted in California and to a level sufficient to restore the lost purchasing power of the federal minimum wage; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to each Senator and Representative in the Congress of the United States, and to the Secretary of Labor."

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. MURKOWSKI:

S. 1684. A bill to promote an international ban on large-scale driftnet fishing on the high seas; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

LARGE SCALE DRIFTNET FISHING ON THE HIGH SEAS PROHIBITION PROMOTION ACT

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill to ban driftnet fishing on the high seas. I have taken the Senate floor numerous times in the past to address the growing international concern with large-scale driftnet fishing in the North Pacific Ocean. As my friends and colleagues know, this is a dangerously efficient method of fishing that does not distinguish the type or quantity of marine life that it kills. While our recent agreements with Japan, Korea, and Taiwan demonstrate an increased international awareness of driftnet fishing, it is imperative that we demonstrate our commitment to the future of our natural resources by endorsing an international ban on all high seas driftnet fishing.

Our marine resources are invaluable, and irreplaceable. They serve as the basis for a wide range of complex biological functions in our marine ecosystem, and are vitally important to commercial and recreational interests. These marine resources are in danger of depletion, Mr. President, and it is our responsibility in the Senate to stop this widespread destruction.

Almost every day throughout the year, Japanese, Korean, and Taiwanese squidfishers lay out over 30,000 miles of net in the North Pacific Ocean. Although they are fishing for squid, it is impossible to discern what type of marine life is entangled in these nets. Consequently, hundreds of thousands of seabirds, marine mammals, immature salmon and steelhead trout are killed. These are unintended deaths, Mr. President, and can only be prevented by the eradication of this method of fishing.

My bill will amend the Magnuson Act to require the Secretary of State to secure an international ban on large-scale driftnet fishing on the high seas as soon as possible. The Secretary will furnish a report on the progress of these negotiations within 18 months of the passage of this act, and subsequent annual reports until an agreement is reached.

As I have said before, we must demonstrate our responsibility to the future of marine resources by endorsing a large-scale ban on driftnet fishing worldwide. South Pacific nations; namely, Australia and New Zealand, have already established a ban in the South Pacific Ocean. While we believe the damage incurred in South Pacific waters has been relatively small compared to the destruction in the North Pacific, these environmentally conscious nations have established a precedent. These nations have admirably responded to the potential threat that this fishing poses in their waters.

This is an excellent move toward the wise management of our resources, Mr. President, a move that should be extended worldwide. I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1684

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

GREAT LAKES FISHERY ACT OF 1956 AMENDMENT

SEC. 5. The Great Lakes Fishery Act of 1956 (16 U.S.C. 931 et seq.) is amended by inserting immediately after section 12 the following new section;

By Mr. ROTH:

S. 1689. A bill to clarify that individuals evicted from assisted housing because of drug-related criminal activity are ineligible for preferential treatment; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

FAIRNESS IN FEDERAL HOUSING ADMISSIONS ACT

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I am introducing a bill to correct an anomaly that plagues our efforts to eliminate the scourge of drugs from the Nation's public housing and to make that housing safe and livable for the large majority of law-abiding public housing residents.

Currently, the law does not prohibit a person evicted from public or assisted housing for drug-related activity from quickly regaining Federal housing assistance. Indeed, unbelievable as it may seem, persons who have been evicted for drug-related activities may actually be given preferential treatment in receiving housing assistance. Existing law essentially allows residents whose drug activity cost them their leases to be placed at the top of long waiting lists for Federal assistance, above many law-abiding citizens who are going through the normal application procedure. It is incumbent upon the Congress to eliminate this loophole, if we are to send a message to the American public that we are at all committed to cleaning the scourge of drugs out of our Nation's federally assisted housing. My bill would explicitly prohibit any preferential treatment for those evicted from public or assisted housing due to drug-related activity.

As ranking minority member of the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, I presided over a hearing last May examining the problem of drugs and public housing. During that hearing, residents of public housing painted a grim picture of the pervasiveness of drugs and violence in their buildings and neighborhoods.

PSI found that the overwhelming majority of residents of public housing are decent, law-abiding Americans. However, a small number of residents involved in drug-related activity can infect an entire neighborhood with drug-related violence, theft, and vandalism. Their activities terrorize neighborhoods and housing developments, making victims of all nearby residents.

Some residents who testified before PSI emphasized that a good way to rid public and assisted housing of drugs is to keep people involved with drugs out of public and assisted housing in the first place. Greater emphasis on screening applicants can prevent problems before they have a chance to get in the door.

But current law requires waiting list preference for persons falling under certain hardship categories, such as those who have been involuntarily displaced, and allows public housing agencies to place such people at the front of the line. These provisions exist for the legitimate reason of providing assistance first to the people who need it the most.

My bill simply prohibits persons who have been evicted from federally assisted housing, by reason of a drug-related activity, from receiving any preferential status in the awarding of Federal public and assisted housing. This legislation does not seek to ban these persons from Federal housing assistance. It merely mandates that they will not be given unwarranted special treatment and will wait their turn at the end of the line. Mr. President, I see no reason why known drug users or traffickers should be given preference in admission to Federal housing assistance, while an estimated 800,000 families are on the waiting list.

I applaud the efforts that are already underway in the Congress to clean up the scourge of drugs from our Nation's public housing. The repeal of section 404 of the dire emergency supplemental appropriations bill is a critical step in the war on drugs in public housing, and that repeal is imminent. However, to move even further, we must close the existing loophole in public housing admissions that currently rewards drug-related activity.

But based on the testimony at our PSI hearings, I can tell you that the people demanding most vigorously that drugs be eliminated from public housing are the public housing residents themselves. They are the people who suffer most from the depredation of drug dealers.

I urge my colleagues to support this measure.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. DODD (for himself, Mr. SIMON, Mr. PELL, Mr. JEFFORDS, and Mr. MATSUNAGA):

S. 1690. A bill to establish programs to improve foreign language instruction, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

FOREIGN LANGUAGE COMPETENCE FOR THE FUTURE ACT

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, as the Congress, the President and the Governors move to bolster our Nation's commitment to educational excellence,

I am pleased to have my colleagues, Senators SIMON, PELL, JEFFORDS, and MATSUNAGA join me in introducing the Foreign Language Competence for the Future Act of 1989. This measure will attempt to meet two of the goals put forth by the Democratic leaders of Congress last week, to "annually improve the foreign language performance of American students until our students exceed the performance of students from other industrialized nations," and to "alleviate the pending teacher shortage."

According to the National Governors' Association report entitled "America in Transition," there are valid reasons for us to be concerned about the state of affairs of our foreign language programs. At least 26 States are experiencing shortages in foreign language teachers, only 17 percent of elementary schools offer any foreign language instruction, and only 1 in 5 high school graduates take more than 2 years of a foreign language.

We are experiencing these shortages at the most inopportune time. As the countries of the world become more interdependent economically, politically and culturally we should be making the best effort to guarantee that the education of our citizens extends beyond our borders.

It is a fact that English is widely spoken—not just by us, but by our economic competitors and foreign diplomats. This, however, should be an incentive, not a disincentive, for Americans to learn their languages as well. We do not want to take a back seat to our economic competitors. However, we will jeopardize our ability to compete if we do not learn the language of the customer. Our foreign competitors who understand our language and culture are better prepared to do business with us. They are working with two hands, their native language and English, while we struggle with only one.

Unfortunately, the United States does lag behind its economic competitors in foreign language competency. There are more teachers of English in the Soviet Union than there are students of Russian in the United States. Educational systems in Europe begin foreign language instruction in the elementary school and many require proficiency in at least a second language. And now, European nations are discussing making the study of a second language a requirement for all students in Europe beginning in 1992.

American students will find that the study of foreign languages would have a positive impact on their academic, cultural and professional interests. My fluency in Spanish has enabled me to better communicate with my Hispanic constituents, to read important political articles written in Spanish and to conduct meetings with leaders of Central and South American countries in their native language. I cannot stress enough the advantages of speaking a foreign language.

Fortunately, Americans are beginning to realize the importance of international education. I credit the Governors for their efforts to draw attention to the need for geographic literacy, international awareness and foreign language competency. However, it will require the participation of all levels of government and the private sector to assure that our youth receive the finest, most comprehensive education. To achieve the goal of educational excellence, we must protect our system from further erosion. We must help meet the needs of our school systems before they become crises. And, the shortage of foreign language teachers and resources is already a problem. We must act now.

The foreign language competence for the future act proposes a variety of ways to combat the problem of teacher shortages and improve the delivery of foreign language instruction. In response to the shortage of teachers, my proposal would provide Federal assistance to institutes of higher learning to establish foreign language institutes for the training and retraining of foreign language educators. The act will also give Federal funds to States, experiencing shortages of foreign language teachers, to offer teacher incentive grants to college students majoring in foreign languages.

The limited availability of foreign language instruction is not only the result of too few teachers. Often schools do not have enough students interested in a critical language to justify hiring a teacher. To combat problems of this nature, my proposal would also make demonstration grants available to institutes of higher learning or nonprofit education associations for the development of the technology necessary for distance learning programs. Federal assistance would also be available to institutes of higher learning and secondary schools interested in forming foreign language consortia. Finally, States could qualify for Federal grants to establish foundations to provide foreign language services to small- and medium-size businesses trying to compete in the international marketplace.

In closing, I would like to add that Congressman PANETTA introduced a similar measure in the House of Representatives earlier this year.

Mr. President, this measure will provide the support schools need to make our educational system the finest in the world. It does not solve all of the problems schools and educators are facing. It does, however, offer a comprehensive approach to the shortages of foreign language teachers and resources that we need so desperately to reduce.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague from Connecticut, Senator DODD, as an original cosponsor of the Foreign Language Competence for the Future Act of 1989.

We are living in a world that becomes smaller every day. Now, we are at a point where our children are no longer only citizens of the United States but of the world. Given that fact, it is more important today than ever before that the leaders of tomorrow have the ability to communicate in other languages. As the world begins to enter an increasingly global market, Americans are forced to compete, understand, and learn about our international community. Transactions ranging from simple business deals to negotiating foreign debt all require a knowledge of another culture's language.

The ability to communicate with all our neighbors is vital to our future if America is to maintain its economic and political strength in the modern world. But the numbers demonstrate that our students lag far behind their foreign counterparts.

Mr. President, only one in five American high school graduates has more than 2 years of a foreign language. Japan requires 6 for all their students. Just one sixth of America's 4-year colleges have a foreign language requirement for entrance. Only 3 percent of high school graduates and 5 percent of college graduates in the United States reach a meaningful proficiency in a second language. The United States remains as the only foreign service in the world that a person may join without being proficient in a foreign language. These statistics must change.

Despite modest growth in foreign language studies in the past decade, 26 States currently report a shortage of language teachers. And without sufficient numbers of teachers, we will never have sufficient numbers of students.

I commend Senator DODD on this timely legislation. If this legislation were enacted, it would provide grants to States for the construction of institutes designed to train elementary and secondary teachers in foreign languages. It would also provide incentives in the form of loan forgiveness to students who plan to teach foreign languages. This is definitely a step in the right direction.

Combined with provisions for language services to business, remote areas, and rural communities, this act signifies an important step for American students and the future of the Nation.

Mr. President, in Botswana, the average fourth grader has had more language study than the average college graduate in the United States. That is a trend that must be reversed, and with the Foreign Language Competence for the Future Act of 1989, that reversal could be closer to reality.●

By Mr. ROTH:

S. 1691. A bill to strengthen the authority of the Director of National Drug Control Policy to approve and revise budget requests of National Drug Control Program agencies; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DRUG CZAR'S BUDGET AUTHORITY

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, a few weeks ago the Bush administration released the first truly comprehensive battle plan for the Federal war on drugs. While the national drug strategy reflects the wisdom and expertise of literally hundreds of contributors, the task of following through on its recommendations will be largely the responsibility of Dr. William J. Bennett, the Director of National Drug Control Policy, or the drug czar as he has come to be known.

If Dr. Bennett, or anyone else holding his position, is to have any chance at success in this essential and enormously difficult task, he needs the tools to accomplish that task.

The bill I am introducing today would do just that by enhancing the drug czar's budget authority, allowing him to approve or revise drug-related budget requests. My bill would give to the drug czar the power that would have been granted him under legislation passed by this body last fall, legislation which was subsequently weakened in the negotiations with the House before final passage.

Mr. President, I don't have to convince any of my colleagues of the severity of the drug problem in this Nation. I certainly don't have to convince the American people; in survey after survey, they have consistently identified drugs as the No. 1 problem facing our country. And though a recent report of the National Institute on Drug Abuse indicates that we are finally making some progress in reducing the number of casual drug users, hardcore addiction and the human misery caused by it are continuing to climb. As Dr. Bennett himself recently pointed out, "Drug crime is up, drug trafficking is up, drug deaths are up [and] drug emergencies in our hospitals are up * * *."

Confronting a problem as formidable and far-reaching as drug abuse demands leadership and cooperation at every level, from local to international. These principles are especially important at the Federal level, where over 30 agencies are involved in some aspect of drug control. We have already spent billions, and will need to spend billions more, to support the antidrug programs of these agencies. Since so much has been invested, and so much is at stake, we must ensure that Federal drug control efforts are coordinated and effective.

But the sad truth is, Mr. President, those efforts have been hampered at times by interagency duplication and infighting. Agencies have all too often been operating at cross purposes, competing with one another instead of coordinating their responsibilities. Indeed, in many agencies, there seems to be a misunderstanding as to who the real enemy is in the drug war—the traffickers or rival agencies. One of the most egregious examples of agency infighting has been taking place in Miami, a critical hotspot in the drug war. There, relations between the local DEA and Customs agents have been so bad that in recent months the two offices have publicly waged a war of words in the local newspapers. Mr. President, this is outrageous.

The necessity of putting a stop to these turf wars and coordinating the Federal drug effort was the principal impetus behind the establishment of the office of the Director of National Drug Control Policy. I was pleased to work closely on the development of this position with several Senators, including my distinguished colleague from Delaware, Senator BIDEN. Those of us who helped develop the drug czar position envisioned an official who would rise above the interests of any one agency to chart the best course in the Federal effort against drugs. At the same time, we were realistic in understanding that the drug czar could not be expected to fulfill this responsibility purely on the basis of friendly persuasion. Therefore, we gave the drug czar the authority to approve or revise budget requests, to ensure that funds are targeted to the areas of greatest priority.

As was pointed out last fall, there is a precedent for this kind of budget authority. The Director of Central Intelligence was given the power to approve or revise budget requests from the various foreign intelligence agencies by President Reagan in Executive Order 12333. There is a basic principle behind this kind of budget authority: in an area, like foreign intelligence, or drug control, where multiple Federal agencies are involved, it is unrealistic to expect one agency to willingly lower its budget request to fund another agency's programs, even if the other agency's programs are arguably more effective. What's needed is an official who can, if necessary, resolve budgetary gridlocks in a way that will best serve the Nation rather than a particular agency. And who is more qualified to make these kinds of tough decisions than an official, like the drug czar, who is spending full time on the issue? Mr. President, the logic behind meaningful budget authority for an official in the drug czar's position is clear. Indeed, not a word of objection was heard to this provision on the Senate floor when the bill passed last fall.

Yet when it came time for the two Houses to reconcile their versions of drug control legislation late last session, the drug czar's authority was dealt a crippling blow. Instead of the power to approve or revise drug-related budget requests, the drug czar's authority was watered down to a certification process, in which the drug czar simply registers his approval or objection to the various budget requests in writing. Although this process establishes a paper trail documenting an agency's adherence or nonadherence to drug strategy priorities, it has no binding power over any agencies. In short, it is a far cry from genuine budget authority.

The legislation that I am introducing today would restore budgetary power to the drug czar, giving him the authority to approve or revise all drug-related budget requests. With this authority, we can reasonably expect the drug czar to fulfill his legislative mandate of coordinating and overseeing Federal drug policy. This authority is essential to give him the leverage and influence he needs over each agency with drug control responsibilities. Without it, the drug czar may face an insurmountable task. As I have pointed out, history gives Federal drug control agencies poor marks for coordination among themselves.

Mr. President, Bill Bennett may have the toughest job of any official in the Federal Government. He needs every tool that we can give him. My legislation would ensure that he has the most useful tool, budget authority.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1691

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That paragraphs (3), (4), and (5) of section 1003(c) of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 (21 U.S.C. 1502(c)) are amended to read as follows:

"(3) The Director shall approve or revise requests transmitted under paragraph (2) in consultation with the appropriate program manager and agency or department head.

"(4) No National Drug Control Program agency shall submit to the Congress a reprogramming or transfer request with respect to any amount of appropriated funds greater than $5,000,000 which is included in the National Drug Control Program budget unless such request has been approved by the Director.

"(5) The head of any National Drug Control Program agency may appeal to the President any decision of the Director on budget, reprogramming or transfer matters relating to such agency." ●

S. 1692. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 with respect to the treatment of certain timber activities under passive loss rules; to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDING THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE WITH RESPECT TO CERTAIN TIMBER ACTIVITIES

● Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I am introducing a bill today that would protect small timberland owners from the unintended impact of the passive activity loss rules issued as a result of the Tax Reform Act of 1986. It would revise the "material participation" test for timberland owners and help foster the efficient management of private forest land.

To the credit of Representatives THOMAS, JENKINS, WYDEN, MORRISON, and CALLAHAN, this legislation has become a part of the fiscal year 1990 budget reconciliation bill as reported by the Ways and Means Committee. All are to be commended for their efforts in this area.

In introducing this bill, I want to make it clear that I do not offer this proposal as an alternative to a capital gains differential. That issue will be considered at a later time as we debate the Senate reconciliation language. Both a reduction in the capital gains tax and a change in the passive activity loss rules are important to timber producers and should be viewed separately.

The bill I am introducing today would correct a flaw in the passive activity rules as they relate to the timber industry. Congress, as part of the comprehensive 1986 tax reforms, passed legislation to curb the widespread and abusive use of tax shelters. Shelters are typically investments in business enterprises that may or may not be bona fide activities. The enterprises were structured to generate losses which were passed through to the taxpayer, because the businesses were operated in partnership form—or in some other form of passthrough entity.

The passive activity loss rules as enacted by Congress provide that if the taxpayer-investor in the business activity does not "materially participate" in the business, the losses from the business that "flow through" to him are passive activity losses [PAL]. These PAL losses are not deductible against the taxpayer's income from other sources, but may only offset against income from other business activities in which the taxpayer does not materially participate. Therefore, if the taxpayer does not have this special kind of income with which to offset the PAL, the losses are not currently deductible but are held in suspense for use in later years when income is generated from passive business activities or when the business activity is sold.

These special rules largely accomplish the intended purpose of discouraging investment in tax shelters since the losses generated, in most instances, do not represent economic out-of-pocket expenditures, but are paper losses generated through use of leveraged acquisitions or other similar arrangements. These antitax shelter rules do not apply if the taxpayer materially participates in the business sustaining the loss. The temporary regulations issued by the Department of the Treasury contain seven tests, one of which must be passed, before the taxpayer is deemed to materially participate in the business. Unfortunately, because of the unique nature of the tree growing business for many small timberland owners it is frequently difficult, if not impossible, for them to meet any one of the seven quantitative tests.

Of the seven tests, the two hourly tests are the ones the small timberland owners have the best chance of passing in order to be treated as material participants. One test requires them to work over 500 hours a year in the tree growing activity. The other allows them to qualify, if they work over 100 hours and can show the "right" facts and circumstances. The temporary regulations shed little light on what may qualify as appropriate facts and circumstances.

The fact is, that in the intervening years between tree harvests, most small timberland owners do not donate 500 hours or even 100 hours per year to their tree growing activities. The actual physical work incurred in managing timberland is done at the direction of the timberland owners by employees or independent contactors. The hours worked by the latter are not counted as hours of participation by the timberland owners. Thus, their annual timber management expenses, to the extent they exceed gross income, cannot be currently deducted.

In between tree harvests there is apt to be little or no gross income from the tree growing activity. In year when there are tree harvests, should the timberland owners work over 100 hours, he may not be able to offset the gain from the timber sales by the prior years' suspended expenses, because the gain may be treated as "active" income from business because he has materially participated. It is potentially a catch 22 situation with the small timberland owner never being able to deduct any of his accumulated suspended timber management expenses.

My bill is identical to the provision for the relief of small timberland owners from the passive activity loss rules contained in the Budget Reconciliation Act for fiscal year 1990—H.R. 3299—now pending in the House of Representatives. My bill provides that timberland owners need not meet a material participation test, if their business activity consists of holding qualified timber property. In this legislation, qualified timber property is defined to mean timberland which contains trees in significant commercial quantities.

The bill is supported by the Forest Farmers Association, the Southeast Lumber Manufacturers Association, the National Forest Products Association, the Southern Forest Products Association, Georgia Pacific, the Georgia Forestry Association, and the Forest Industries Council for Timber Valuation and Taxation.

Enactment of this relief provision in no way weakens the antitax shelter thrust of the passive activity loss rules contained in section 469 of the Internal Revenue Code. It will allow thousands of small timberland owners to return to the practice of deducting their business expenses as they are incurred which will allow them to efficiently manage their timber stands. The bill does more than just provide relief for small timberland owners, it addresses the policy issue of future timber supply and the very important policy of encouraging conservation.

In my home State of Georgia, the timber industry is the State's leading industry. While the industry includes large mills and pulp companies, by a large margin, most of the timber is owned by individuals who are relatively small operators. Many of them own 500 acres or less. Most of the timber for making lumber, paper, and other wood products comes from the timber stands of these small, individual owners. To deny these owners the right to currently offset their cash expenditures against other sources of income essentially requires them to capitalize their timber management expenses until they sell their trees, which may not occur for many years. This will deter them from engaging in efficient management of their trees and that, in the long run, will reduce future supplies of wood.

I am pleased to be able to join with my colleagues from the House in offering this legislation, and I hope that it can be enacted as a part of the reconciliation legislation this year.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1692

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. TREATMENT OF CERTAIN TIMBER ACTIVITIES UNDER PASSIVE LOSS RULES.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Subsection (c) of section 469 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (defining passive activity) is amended by redesignating paragraphs (4), (5), and (6) as paragraphs (5), (6), and (7), respectively, and by inserting after paragraph (3) the following new paragraph:

"(4) CERTAIN INTERESTS IN TIMBER PROPERTY.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The term 'passive activity' shall not include any interest in qualified timber property (as defined in section 194(c)(1)) held by a natural person directly or through an entity which does not limit the liability of such person with respect to such interest.

"(B) INCOME IN SUBSEQUENT YEARS.—If any taxpayer has any loss for any taxable year from an interest in any qualified timber property (as so defined) which is treated as a loss which is not from a passive activity, then any net income from such property (or any other property the basis of which is determined in whole or part by reference to the basis of such property) for any succeeding taxable year shall be treated as income of the taxpayer which is not from a passive activity."

(b) TECHNICAL AMENDMENT.—Paragraph (5) of section 469(c) of such Code (as redesignated by subsection (a)) is amended by striking "(2) and (3)" each place it appears and inserting "(2), (3), and (4)".

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1989.●

● Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator NUNN, as an original cosponsor of his legislation amending the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 with respect to the treatment of certain timber activities under passive loss rules. This legislation is vital to future timber supply problems and conservation practices.

I would like to highlight that this legislation is a derivative of legislation promoted by Congressman MORRISON, who represents the Fourth District in Washington State. Congressman MORRISON, and Congressman RON WYDEN, of Oregon, had the foresight to introduce the "Farm and Woodland Owners Tax Simplification Act" in February 1989. Later a measure modeled after this legislation was incorporated into the fiscal year 1990 budget reconciliation package as reported by the House of Representatives Ways and Means Committee.

In Washington State over 4.5 million acres would be affected by this legislation, which provides important incentives to keep this private, nonindustrial land in timber production. The 4.5 million acres owned by family-size tree farmers comprises of approximately one half of all private timber land in Washington State. In the Pacific Northwest we are especially concerned with these incentives due to ever-increasing population growth. The land most likely to be encroached upon for development is now forested. It is important for Congress to realize the environmental benefits of encouraging private land owners to remain in forest management. These private land owners often have other careers and manage their tree farms as long term investments.

The 30,000 family size tree farmers in Washington must now accumulate their annual management costs, property taxes, and mortgage interest year after year, and can only deduct them from a harvest that comes once in a lifetime. Many land owners are discouraged or financially unable to grow trees under such a rule. This bill would allow an owner—who makes the management decisions—to deduct the tree farm expenses in the year the bills are paid. Current rules require the owner to work 500 hours per year on the tree farm to deduct these costs. Management costs including fertilization, thinning, and other intensive management activities make this land more productive, further enhancing its value as tree farms. This increased productivity contributes to overall timber supply.

Many older couples or surviving spouses manage their tree farms and hire others to do the heavy work. Yet, present rules disallow a deduction of these tree farm expenses until the timber is harvested. This change in the passive loss rules would allow those deductions annually from other income.

This legislation makes sense economically and environmentally. It promotes sound forest management and importantly promotes an incentive to our nonindustrial private timber land owners to remain in the business of forestry. With this legislation, land owners can do what is important to them—provide jobs, practice wildlife conservation, and exercise sound forest management practices. All are vital to protecting the integrity of the Pacific Northwest. These people deserve our appreciation for retaining their land in tree production, and this legislation is an important step in that direction.●

By Mr. HEFLIN (for himself and Mr. SHELBY):

S. 1694. A bill to add approximately 500 miles to the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways for construction of an interstate route to connect Memphis, TN, with Chattanooga, TN, and Atlanta, GA, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

TENNESSEE VALLEY INTERSTATE HIGHWAY SYSTEM

● Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to rise today to introduce legislation which will authorize funds to add approximately 500 miles to our National System of Interstate and Defense Highways by constructing an interstate route connecting Memphis, TN, with Chattanooga, TN, and Atlanta, GA.

Much has happened in the city of Huntsville, the communities of north Alabama and the Tennessee Valley since the 1950 Census precluded Huntsville and all other north Alabama cities from being directly connected with the Interstate Highway System. With the lone exception of I-65 which connects Birmingham and Nashville, this region has grown without the benefit of interstates.

Today, Huntsville is the home of the Army Missile Command at Redstone Arsenal where the strategic defense initiative and other sophisticated Army weapons systems are conceived, designed, contracted for, deployed and maintained; home for NASA's Marshall Space Flight Center where our country's exploration into space began and continues; where several Fortune 500 high-technology companies have been started and maintain headquarters; where the Huntsville-Madison County Airport operates as one of the top facilities in the United States; and where the Huntsville Port of Entry is the second busiest in the U.S. Customs Southeastern Region's 8th District.

Mr. President, today Huntsville, AL, is the growth center of the State of Alabama and the metropolitan area which ranks seventh in economic growth nationwide. This city and this area of the State require further interstate linkage for the good of our national defense, Federal, State, and local governments and the traveling public. I strongly urge my colleagues to support this legislation.●

● Mr. SHELBY. Mr. President, I rise today in support of the bill introduced by my friend and colleague Senator HEFLIN which will add approximately 500 miles to the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways for construction of an interstate route to connect Memphis, TN, with Chattanooga, TN, and Atlanta, GA.

In 1956, north Alabama was left out of the Interstate System with the exception of I-65, which passes through the region and connects Nashville and Birmingham. Thirteen years later, however, the predicted industrialization of the Tennessee Valley became fact. With the mounting importance of the Army Missile Command at Redstone Arsenal, the establishment of NASA's Marshall Space Flight Center where our country's space exploration began, and the opening of the Huntsville-Madison County Airport, north Alabama qualified at the top of the list for the I-565 connector out of the 1,500 miles added as a cap to the Nation's Interstate System.

Today, 20 years later, I-565 is under construction. The Army Missile Command is now a fixed military installation, Marshall Space Flight Center is the heart of our Nation's space program and the technology and limitless capability represented by individuals and industries located there is recognized worldwide.

Mr. President, I believe it is imperative that we realize the connection of north Alabama with Atlanta, Chattanooga, and Memphis for reasons associated with our national defense, public necessity and convenience. I urge my colleagues to support this bill.●

By Mr. HARKIN (for himself, Mr. CONRAD, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. DASCHLE, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. FOWLER, Mr. GLENN, and Mr. SIMON):

S. 1695. A bill to provide financial assistance to conduct agricultural research and to commercialize such research, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

ALTERNATIVE AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH AND COMMERCIALIZATION ACT

● Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, I am very pleased to be introducing today along with Senator CONRAD, the Alternative Agricultural Research and Commercialization Act. Senator CONRAD has taken a major leadership role in the area of developing new uses for our agricultural commodities. Our bill enjoys as cosponsors Senator LEAHY, chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee, Senator DASCHLE, chairman of the Agricultural Research Subcommittee, Senator BURDICK, chairman of the Agriculture Appropriations Subcommittee, and Senators GLENN, BOSCHWITZ, SIMON, and FOWLER, all of whom have long been interested in expanding the range of end uses for our agricultural products.

The Alternative Agricultural Research and Commercialization Act would establish a comprehensive program of agricultural research that would facilitate the development and delivery to the marketplace of new nonfood uses for our agricultural products. The measure brings together the objectives of both the Alternative Agriculture Products Act and the Agricultural Research Commercialization Act—two measures which have attracted a lot of attention in recent years. We have developed a comprehensive measure that will both support the research and development of industrial and commercial products from crops and crop materials and provide financial assistance to businesses and other entities who are interested in bringing new industrial and commercial products to the marketplace.

Both functions would be placed under the jurisdiction of a single corporation, the Alternative Agricultural Research and Commercialization Corporation, which would be overseen by a single board. It is my belief that this will maximize coordination between the research and commercialization activities. Members of the board would be appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Director of the National Science Foundation. Peer review of proposed research projects would be required and a system of regional centers would be established to provide for local input on commercialization activities.

We are all aware of the fact that our agricultural factory, with its level of technology, superior natural resouce base, and the amazing productive of the American farmer, can outproduce most of the other countries of the world combined. Such a reality is both a blessing and a curse.

As the capacity to produce traditional commodities such as corn or soybeans increases, our farmers face three choices. First, there can be greater and greater levels of production in excess of demand, but this means lower prices that will not cover the costs of production. Second, we can leave part of our farm land idle. Or, we can find new uses for our crops. I believe that this is the best solution.

Current research being conducted at USDA is too often directed at improving yields of existing crops. While it is important to remain competitive, we must recognize and address the problem of overproduction. We must develop new plants or plant varieties capable of producing new industrial and commercial products that can compete in the marketplace. We need to develop the means to modify plant materials so they can be used in industry. These developments will allow us to expand production without running into problems with excessive surpluses.

But research, while essential, is not enough. We must take that research and see that it actually has a chance in the marketplace. The scientific journals are full of solid concepts that have never seen the light of day. The key is "technology transfer" so that we can move these ideas and products from the laboratory into the marketplace. AARCC would provide technical and financial assistance—both essential ingredients for growth in this, or in any, new industry.

American agriculture has to move beyond just being the largest exporter of raw farm commodities into the forefront of a whole new industrial frontier. We can utilize the U.S. advantage in research and technological know-how to add value to our commodities and create entirely new products.

Diversification isn't just a good idea any more, it's a necessity. The steel and auto industries, which are struggling to survive on old technology, illustrate this point all too clearly. American agriculture, America's largest industry, faces a choice—it can go on in the same way and risk stagnation, perhaps even decline. Or, it can grow and adapt with new technology.

Our future depends not only on what we grow in the ground, but what we develop in our laboratories, our universities and our factories. The potential is almost limitless. Many things that can be produced from a barrel of oil can be produced from a bushel of corn.

Let's get on with the job of pushing agriculture's limits—and see what we can accomplish.

I ask unanimous consent that a summary of the measure be inserted into the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF ALTERNATIVE AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH AND COMMERCIALIZATION ACT

Section 1: Short Title.—This Act is entitled the "Alternative Agricultural Research and Commercialization Act of 1989."

SUBTITLE 1: ESTABLISHMENT OF ALTERNATIVE AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH AND COMMERCIALIZATION CORPORATION

Section 101: Findings and Purpose.—Congress recognizes the potential of three related forces in the U.S.—our scientific capacity to modify plants and plant materials, the inventiveness of our agricultural research sector, and our unmatched agricultural production capacity—to develop new nonfood, nonfeed industrial products derived from agricultural commodities. However, Congress finds that many of the emerging new ideas, products and processes resulting from agricultural research will not be developed and commercialized because of high initial financing costs and high risk.

Therefore, Congress believes that a major increase in targeted research to develop new industrial products derived from agricultural commodities is necessary. Congress also believes that the careful targeting of financial assistance to entrepreneurs for the commercialization of new industrial products will be a cost effective means of redeveloping the rural economy and stabilizing the agricultural sector.

It is the purpose of this Act to lend a hand in the difficult process of developing and commercializing nonfood, nonfeed products and processes using agricultural and forestry crops. It will provide the vital coordination of cooperative development efforts among manufacturers, financiers, universities and private and public laboratories to speed the commercialization of these products and processes. The goals are to strengthen the rural economy; to create jobs, to expand the market for traditional crops and new crops which are suitable for production on family-sized farms; and to enhance U.S. competitiveness in international markets.

Section 102: Definitions.—This section defines terms used in this bill, including "new industrial product development," which means targeted research necessary to make a product available for the marketplace and "commercialization" which means all activities related to product commercialization from the development of prototype products or industrial plants to the market development of new industrial uses.

Section 103: Establishment of Corporation.—A nonprofit corporation is established within the United States Department of Agriculture, entitled the "Alternative Agricultural Research and Commercialization Corporation" (AARCC). The Corporation shall serve as the hub for 4 to 9 Regional Centers, where its main activities shall be carried out.

Section 104: Powers of the Corporation.—AARCC shall have general corporate powers. As a wholly-owned government corporation, AARCC shall be subject to the more stringent standards of auditing and oversight under the Government Corporate Control Act.

Section 105: Corporate Board of Directors.—The Board of Directors shall be composed of nine members, including the Assistant Secretary for Science and Education and the Undersecretary of Agriculture for Small Community and Rural Development. The Secretaries of Agriculture and Commerce shall appoint two and three members, respectively, and two members shall be appointed by the Director of the National Science Foundation. These Directors, serving five-year terms, shall represent the agricultural, scientific, financial, and managerial sectors. They may hold full-time jobs while serving as Directors and at least three members shall be from the private sector. The Board of Directors shall elect a Chairman.

The Board of Directors shall recommend research projects to the Secretary for funding, and shall approve applications for financial assistance for commercialization projects, including the type and amount of assistance.

Section 106: Powers and Duties of the Corporate Board.—The Board has the authority to delegate to the Regional Centers the bulk of the activities of the Corporation. The Corporation shall adopt bylaws, develop an organizational structure, and hire a limited number of staff members, which may include a General Counsel, Treasurer, and Executive Director, who shall be considered federal employees. The choice of officers and employees shall be nonpartisan.

The Board may establish boards of experts to provide advice, and may hold hearings when appropriate.

Section 107: Compensation.—Board members, except for the Assistant Secretary and the Undersecretary, shall receive compensation equivalent to the daily prorated amount of Level II of the Executive Schedule, plus reimbursement for reasonable expenses. If absolutely necessary, the Board may, with the Secretary's approval, pay one officer or employee above the federal pay scale.

Section 108: Financial Disclosure and Conflicts of Interest.—Members of the Board of Directors and all other officers and employees are subject to the Ethics in Government Act.

A Director or a member of an Advisory Council is precluded from voting on any matter in which such individual has a financial interest. Directors who violate this rule shall be removed from the Board.

Section 109: Authorization of Administrative Expenditures.—Administrative expenses are required to be kept to a minimum in order to make available more money for research grants and financial assistance for commercialization projects.

Section 110: Criminal Sanctions.—The Corporation and its Directors, officers and employees are subject to criminal sanctions for releasing proprietary information.

SUBTITLE 2: RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Section 201: Research Projects.—The Secretary shall select research projects to develop and produce new industrial products, based on the recommendations of the Board. The projects shall be peer reviewed.

Criteria for selection shall include the potential to enhance economical production methods for new industrial products, the potential market size of the new industrial product proportional to the funding requested, the time needed to develop and commercialize the product, and the potential profitability of the crop used in the product to the farmer. Additional criteria include the potential to reduce agricultural subsidies, the inavailability of non-federal funding, the impact on resource conservation and the environment, and the likely benefit to family-sized farmers and rural communities.

The funding provided under this subtitle may go to the projects proposed by consortia, but may not be used to acquire, build or repair a building or facility. Grants may be made for a minimum or three years. The Board may review the progress of and make recommendations to the Secretary concerning continued research.

SUBTITLE 3: ESTABLISHMENT OF REGIONAL CENTERS

Section 301: Regional Centers.—Each Regional Center shall be located in a different state, which reflects to the extent possible the regional climatic conditions and rural economic stress. States which apply for a Center must demonstrate the ability to develop a partnership between private and public sector and universities to commercialize new industrial products made from agricultural commodities. The location of Regional Centers shall be competitively awarded based on proposals submitted to the Board of Directors of AARCC.

Regional Centers must be located at host institutions, which include universities or other institutions of higher education, Agricultural Research Service laboratories, State Agricultural Experiment Stations, Extension Service facilities, or other organizations which are involved in the development of commercialization of new industrial uses for agricultural commodities, or in rural economic development.

In addition, states must provide for the matching of funds provided by the federal government for administrative costs, which may include in-kind support such as office space, equipment and staff support.

Each Regional Center shall be headed by a Regional Director, selected by the Board, to carry out the activities of the Corporation, who will work in consultation with an Advisory Council appointed by the Board of Directors and a broad network of volunteers available for project review. Each Regional Director shall have a small support staff.

Section 302: Activities of the Regional Center.—The Regional Centers shall (1) develop a network of scientists, engineers, financiers, business managers, and other specialists to assist in project review; (2) provide business and technical counseling to small businesses to commercialize new industrial uses of agriculture and forestry products; (3) seek out new, nonfood, nonfeed agricultural product ideas which can contribute to rural economic growth; and (4) evaluate and recommend applicants for financial assistance for commercialization. The Regional Centers shall coordinate their activities with the Small Business Development Centers.

SUBTITLE 4: FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR COMMERCIALIZATION

Section 401: Provision of Financial Assistance.—The Corporation is authorized to provide low-interest loans, loan guarantees, interest subsidies, repayable grants matched by private, state or local public funds, umbrella bonding and debentures to eligible applicants to commercialize industrial products using agricultural and forestry crops.

The Board may establish a discretionary fund for each Regional Center to be used for activities related to the financial assistance described above. The Regional Directors shall account for expenditures from these funds twice a year.

The Corporation, through the Regional Centers, shall monitor the progress of ongoing projects and provide supportive business and technical counseling as needed, assisted by the Advisory Council.

Section 402: Eligibility Criteria for Financial Assistance.—An applicant may be eligible for financial assistance if such applicant's proposal to commercialize a new, nonfood, nonfeed industrial product or process is scientifically sound, technologically feasible and marketable. Priority shall be given to proposals which create jobs in economically distressed rural areas, and have financial participation by state or local government or the private sector.

The entities eligible for assistance shall be small businesses as defined under the Small Business Act, universities or other institutions of higher education, nonprofit organizations and cooperatives.

The applicant must show that the proposal has broad application, will create net new jobs in rural areas, and that the applicant's own resources are invested in the project, but that adequate public or private sector funding is not available without AARCC participation. The Corporation shall ensure the confidentiality of proposals.

The Corporation shall establish additional criteria for use when choosing among equivalent applications. These criteria shall emphasize the quantity and quality of jobs created, the level financial participation by state or local government or private entities, the qualifications of the management, and the level of market demand for the product. Criteria also includes the quantity and quality of jobs created, the potential market demand for the new industrial product proportional to the financial assistance requested, the likely financial return to the Corporation, the potential to reduce federal crop subsidies, the impact on resource conservation and the environment, and the likely benefits to family-sized farmers and rural communities.

Section 403: Repayment of Financial Assistance.—A business entity shall repay the financial assistance it receives from the Corporation according to its contract with the Corporation. The Corporation is given great flexibility in negotiating the amount and type of this repayment. The maximum repayment period for financial assistance shall be 12 years. The Board may waive the repayment of financial assistance if necessary.

SUBTITLE 5: REVOLVING FUND

Section 501: Revolving Fund.—The Corporation is designed to be self-funding. A revolving fund is established to receive sums from the repayment of financial assistance and contribution to the Corporation. Administered by the Board, the fund shall be used to provide financial assistance authorized by this section and pay operational costs.

SUBTITLE 6: AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

Section 601: Authorization of Appropriations.—The Corporation is authorized to receive such sums as may be appropriated through fiscal year 1999. Of that sum, $10 million shall be made available in 1990, $20 million in FY 1991, $30 million in FY 1992, $50 million in FY 1993, and $75 million in each of the following fiscal years to implement Subtitle 2: Research and Development.●

RACIAL JUSTICE ACT

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my colleagues Senators HATFIELD, SIMON, SPECTER, MOYNIHAN, METZENBAUM, and LEVIN in introducing the Racial Justice Act.

Race discrimination is unacceptable everywhere, and it is particularly unacceptable in capital punishment—the awesome decision by a free society of those whom Government can legally kill. If that decision is to be made at all, it must be made without racial bigotry.

There is compelling evidence that race discrimination infects capital sentencing decisions in jurisdictions throughout the country.

In study after study, experts have found that defendants who kill whites are more likely to receive the death penalty than those who kill blacks, and that black defendants are more likely to be given a death sentence than white defendants.

A recent example is the evidence before the Supreme Court in the case of McCleskey versus Kemp. Warren McCleskey, the defendent in that case, was a black man charged with murder for killing a white police officer in Fulton County, GA.

In challenging his death sentence, McCleskey placed into evidence two studies conducted by teams led by Prof. David Baldus of the University of Iowa College of Law which analyzed over 2,400 homicide cases in Georgia between 1973 and 1979. From official State records, the Baldus studies collected data about more than 500 factors in each case such as the characteristics of the defendant and the victim, the circumstances of the crime, the strength of the evidence, and a range of mitigating and aggravating factors in each case. Using sophisticated statistical techniques, the studies took account of the effects of up to 230 nonracial sentencing factors.

The conclusions are striking: When the characteristics of the crime and the defendant were controlled for, those who killed whites were 4.3 times more likely to receive the death penalty than killers of blacks.

This pattern of racial effects on sentencing is repeated in jurisdiction after jurisdiction around the country.

In Florida, a study published in the Stanford Law Review found that defendants convicted of killing whites were eight times more likely to receive a death sentence than those convicted of murdering blacks. Another study found that blacks who kill whites received the death penalty 22 percent of the time, while whites who kill whites received the death penalty only 4.6 percent of the time.

In Georgia, blacks who kill whites received the death penalty 16.7 percent of the time, while whites who killed whites received the death penalty only 4.2 percent of the time.

In Illinois, that same study found that killers of whites were six times as likely to receive a death sentence as killers of blacks.

In Maryland, defendants convicted of murdering whites received the death sentence eight times more frequently than killers of blacks.

In Ohio, a 1980 study found that blacks who kill whites received the death penalty 25 percent of the time, while whites who kill whites received the death penalty only 4.6 percent of the time.

In Texas, one 1980 study found that killers of whites were 20 times more likely to receive a death sentence, while a 1985 study found that they were over four times more likely to do so. Meanwhile, blacks who kill whites received the death penalty 8.7 percent of the time, while whites who killed whites received the death penalty only 1.5 percent of the time.

This pattern also appears in California and Pennsylvania, and nationally as well. A 1985 study of capital sentencing conducted by a Dallas newspaper found that killers of whites were nearly three times more likely to receive death sentences than killers of blacks.

Race discrimination is pervasive in capital punishment. The facts are irrefutable, and they should be unacceptable to each and every member of the Senate.

The five members of the Supreme Court who voted to affirm McCleskey's sentence did not dispute the accuracy of the Baldus studies. They admitted that statistical evidence of the kind contained in the studies would be sufficient to provide intentional race discrimination in other areas, such as housing, and jury selection.

But the majority concluded that the death penalty is "different," because individual juries and prosecutors make sentencing decisions, and because it would be inappropriate to require the States to call on these individuals to rebut a showing of discrimination.

I believe that the McCleskey decision is a mistake. The compelling evidence that McCleskey's sentence was affected by racial considerations should have been sufficient to set aside his sentence. In its zeal to expedite proceedings in capital cases, the Court failed to recognize a glaring injustice that Congress should not tolerate, even if five justices of the Supreme Court are willing to permit it.

I oppose the death penalty in all cases, but that is not the issue here. The Members of the Senate have the authority, and the responsibility, to ensure that racial disparities of the kind I have described do not occur in State or Federal death penalty cases.

The Racial Justice Act is intended to meet that responsibility. The act prohibits the imposition of the death penalty under State or Federal law if the sentence is part of a "racially discriminatory pattern."

If a discriminatory pattern exists—if a defendant can establish that the race of defendants or victims is playing a role in sentencing—then the Government must show by clear and convincing evidence that the racial disparities are not the result of discrimination, but reflect nonracial factors, such as the presence or absence of mitigating or aggravating circumstances.

For example, if a defendant offers statistical evidence demonstrating that blacks receive death sentences in a particular State at a rate higher than whites, and the defendant shows that the death sentence was imposed in furtherance of this racially discriminatory pattern, then the State must show by clear and convincing evidence that the statistical disparity results from other, nonracial factors, such as differences in the nature of the crimes or in the conviction records of the defendants.

If the Government cannot meet that burden, the death sentence must be vacated. If we are serious about ending race discrimination in capital sentencing, no other result is acceptable.

By permitting statistical evidence of a pattern of racial disparities to be used to establish a claim of race discrimination, the act makes the standard of proof in capital sentencing cases analogous to that under other Federal antidiscrimination statutes.

In order to ensure that adequate data are available to determine whether or not race discrimination exists, the amendment also requires jurisdictions which have the death penalty to collect and maintain data about the nature of crimes for which the death penalty may be imposed, the details of those crimes, and the demographic characteristics of the victims and the defendants.

The Racial Justice Act is supported by a number of leading organizations, including the American Bar Association, and the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights.

If we are to live up to our responsibility to fulfill the Constitution's promise of equal protection of the laws, we must ensure that race discrimination in capital punishment is eliminated. The Racial Justice Act is a practical step to achieve a goal that our system of justice must seek if it is to be worthy of the name.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the Racial Justice Act be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1696

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Racial Justice Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds that—

(1) section 5 of the fourteenth amendment of the United States Constitution calls upon Congress to enforce the Constitution's promise of equality under law;

(2) equality under law is tested most profoundly by whether a legal system tolerates race playing a role in the determination of whether and when to administer the ultimate penalty of death;

(3) the death penalty is being administered in a pattern that evidences a significant risk that the race of the defendant, or the race of the victim against whom the crime was committed, influences the likelihood that the defendant will be sentenced to death;

(4) the Constitution's guarantee of equal justice for all is jeopardized when the death penalty is imposed in a pattern in which the likelihood of a death sentence is affected by the race of the perpetrator or of the victim;

(5) the United States Supreme Court has concluded that the Federal judiciary is institutionally unable to eliminate this jeopardy to equal justice in the absence of proof that a legislature, prosecutor, judge, or jury acted with racially invidious and discriminatory motives in the case of a particular defendant;

(6) the interest in ensuring equal justice under law may be harmed, not only by decisions motivated by explicit racial bias, but also by government rules, policies, and practices that operate to reinforce the subordinate status to which racial minorities were relegated in our society;

(7) the institutional need of courts to identify invidiously motivated perpetrators is not shared by Congress, which is empowered by section 5 of the fourteenth amendment to take system-wide, preventive measures not only to eliminate adjudicated instances of official race discrimination but also to eradicate wide-scale patterns and practices that entail an intolerable danger that persons of different races would be treated differently; and

(8) the persistent racial problems pervading the implementation of the death penalty in many parts of this Nation require the Government of the United States to counteract the lingering effects of racial prejudice in order to enforce the constitutional guarantee of equal justice for all Americans.

SEC. 3. AMENDMENT TO TITLE 28.

(a) PROCEDURE.—Part VI of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new chapter:

"CHAPTER 177—RACIALLY DISCRIMINATORY CAPITAL SENTENCING

"Sec.
"2921. Definitions.
"2922. Prohibition on the imposition or execution of the death penalty in a racially discriminatory pattern.
"2923. Data on death penalty cases.
"2924. Enforcement of the chapter.
"2925. Construction of chapter.

"§ 2921. Definitions

"For purposes of the chapter—

"(1) the term 'a racially discriminatory pattern' means a situation in which sentences of death are imposed more frequently—

"(A) upon persons of one race than upon persons of another race; or

"(B) as punishment for crimes against persons of one race than as punishment for crimes against persons of another race, and the greater frequency is not explained by pertinent nonracial circumstances;

"(2) the term 'death-eligible crime' means a crime for which death is a punishment that is authorized by law to be imposed under any circumstances upon a conviction of that crime;

"(3) the term 'case of death-eligible crime' means a case in which the complaint, indictment, information, or any other initial or subsequent charging paper charges any person with a death-eligible crime; and

"(4) the term 'Federal or State entity' means any State, the District of Columbia, the United States, any territory thereof, and any subdivision or authority of any of these entities that is empowered to provide by law that death be imposed as punishment for crime.

"§ 2922. Prohibition on the imposition or execution of the death penalty in a racially discriminatory pattern

"(a) PROHIBITION.—It is unlawful to impose or execute sentences of death under color of State or Federal law in a racially discriminatory pattern. No person shall be put to death in the execution of a sentence imposed pursuant to any law if that person's death sentence furthers a racially discriminatory pattern.

"(b) ESTABLISHMENT OF A PATTERN.—To establish that a racially discriminatory pattern exists for purposes of this chapter—

"(1) ordinary methods of statistical proof shall suffice; and

"(2) it shall not be necessary to show discriminatory motive, intent, or purpose on the part of any individual or institution.

"(c) PRIMA FACIE SHOWING.—(1) To establish a prima facie showing of a racially discriminatory pattern for purposes of this chapter, it shall suffice that death sentences are being imposed or executed—

"(A) upon persons of one race with a frequency that is disproportionate to their representation among the numbers of persons arrested for, charged with, or convicted of, death-eligible crimes; or

"(B) as punishment for crimes against persons of one race with a frequency that is disproportionate to their representation among persons against whom death-eligible crimes have been committed.

"(2) To rebut a prima facie showing of a racially discriminatory pattern, a State or Federal entity must establish by clear and convincing evidence that identifiable and pertinent nonracial factors persuasively explain the observable racial disparities comprising the pattern.

"§ 2923. Data on death penalty cases

"(a) DESIGNATION OF AGENCY.—Any State or Federal entity that provides by law for death to be imposed as a punishment for any crime shall designate a central agency to collect and maintain pertinent data on the charging, disposition, and sentencing patterns for all cases of death-eligible crimes.

"(b) RESPONSIBILITIES OF CENTRAL AGENCY.—Each central agency designated pursuant to subsection (a) shall—

"(1) affirmatively monitor compliance with this chapter by local officials and agencies;

"(2) devise and distribute to every local official or agency responsible for the investigation or prosecution of death-eligible crimes a standard form to collect pertinent data;

"(3) maintain all standard forms, compile and index all information contained in the forms, and make both the forms and the compiled information publicly available;

"(4) maintain a centralized, alphabetically indexed file of all police and investigative reports transmitted to it by local officials or agencies in every case of death-eligible crime; and

"(5) allow access to its file of police and investigative reports to the counsel of record for any person charged with any death-eligible crime or sentenced to death who has made or intends to make a claim under section 2922 and it may also allow access to this file to other persons.

"(c) RESPONSIBILITY OF LOCAL OFFICIAL.—(1) Each local official responsible for the investigation or prosecution of death-eligible crimes shall—

"(A) complete the standard form developed pursuant to subsection (b)(2) on every case of death-eligible crime; and

"(B) transmit the standard form to the central agency no later than 3 months after the disposition of each such case whether that disposition is by dismissal of charges, reduction of charges, acceptance of a plea of guilty to the death-eligible crime or to another crime, acquittal, conviction, or any decision not to proceed with prosecution.

"(2) In addition to the standard form, the local official or agency shall transmit to the central agency one copy of all police and investigative reports made in connection with each case of death-eligible crime.

"(d) PERTINENT DATA.—The pertinent data required in the standard form shall be designated by the central agency but shall include, at a minimum, the following information:

"(1) pertinent demographic information on all persons charged with the crime and all victims (including race, sex, age, and national origin);

"(2) information on the principal features of the crime;

"(3) information on the aggravating and mitigating factors of the crime, including the background and character of every person charged with the crime; and

"(4) a narrative summary of the crime.

"§ 2924. Enforcement of the Chapter

"(a) ACTION UNDER SECTIONS 2241, 2254, OR 2255 OF THIS TITLE.—In any action brought in a court of the United States within the jurisdiction conferred by sections 2241, 2254, or 2255, in which any person raises a claim under section 2922—

"(1) the court shall appoint counsel for any such person who is financially unable to retain counsel; and

"(2) the court shall furnish investigative, expert or other services necessary for the adequate development of the claim to any such person who is financially unable to obtain such services.

"(b) DETERMINATION BY A STATE COURT.—Notwithstanding section 2254, no determination on the merits of a factual issue made by a State court pertinent to any claim under section 2922 shall be presumed to be correct unless—

"(1) the State is in compliance with section 2923;

"(2) the determination was made in a proceeding in a State court in which the person asserting the claim was afforded rights to the appointment of counsel and to the furnishing of investigative, expert and other services necessary for the adequate development of the claim which were substantially equivalent to those provided by subsection (a); and

"(3) the determination is one which is otherwise entitled to be presumed to be correct under the criteria specified in section 2254.

"§ 2925. Construction of chapter

"Nothing contained in this chapter shall be construed to affect in one way or the other the lawfulness of any sentence of death that does not violate section 2922.".

(b) AMENDMENT TO TABLE OF CHAPTERS.—The table of chapters of part VI of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"177. Racially Discriminatory Capital Sentencing ..... 2921.".

SEC. 4. ACTIONS PRIOR TO THE DATE OF ENACTMENT.

No person shall be barred from raising any claim under section 2922 of title 28, United States Code, as added by this Act, on the ground of having failed to raise or to prosecute the same or a similar claim prior to enactment of the Act, nor by reason of any adjudication rendered prior to its enactment.

By Mr. LAUTENBERG (for himself, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. LIEBERMAN, Mr. CONRAD, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. PELL, and Mr. DODD):

S. 1697. A bill to require local educational agencies to conduct testing for radon contamination in schools, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

RADON TESTING FOR SAFE SCHOOLS ACT

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, today I am introducing the Radon Testing for Safe Schools Act to address the health threat that radon poses in our country's schools. I am pleased that Senator CHAFEE, the ranking minority member of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, is the prime cosponsor of this bill. Similar legislation has been introduced by Congressman BART GORDON in the House. I want to commend Congressman GORDON for his initiative.

Mr. President, radon is one of the most serious environmental health risks facing the country today. EPA estimates that as many as 20,000 people die of lung cancer each year from exposure to radon. Last September, EPA and the Surgeon General's Office issued a national health advisory urging people to test their homes after survey results showed that 1 in 4 homes in 17 States surveyed has elevated radon levels.

In April, EPA completed a pilot survey to measure radon levels in 130 schools across the country. This survey found that one in five classrooms has elevated radon levels and that over half of the schools tested have at least one classroom with elevated radon levels. Our Nation's children are needlessly exposed to dangerous radon levels, which may be especially hazardous to their developing lungs.

The Congress has consistently expressed its concern about radon in schools. Legislation I wrote, which was included in the 1986 Superfund Amendments and Reauthorization Act, requires EPA to "identify the locations in the United States where radon is found in structures where people normally live or work, including educational institutions." And in 1988, the Congress passed legislation introduced by Senator CHAFEE, Senator MITCHELL, myself, and others requiring EPA to conduct a national survey of radon in schools. EPA has begun its national survey of residences and, this winter, will conduct a more extensive national assessment of radon in schools.

The bill I am introducing today builds on this national assessment of radon in schools. This bill requires that, once EPA has identified areas where schools exhibit high radon levels, as required by the State Radon Program Development Act of 1988, local educational agencies in those areas test all their buildings for radon by September 30, 1993. Test results would be made available to the public. The bill also requires that school radon testing and mitigation in these high-radon areas be done with devices and methods consistent with EPA guidelines and conducted by firms approved by either EPA or State proficiency programs.

Second, the bill addresses the need to help schools that need financial assistance to address their radon problems. The legislation establishes in EPA a Radon Testing and Mitigation Assistance Program to provide loans and grants to local educational agencies is high radon areas to test and mitigate their buildings. The bill also establishes civil penalties for local educational agencies that do not comply with this legislation or that falsify testing results.

Last, the bill authorizes $5 million to EPA through 1993 to help local education agencies test their buildings. In addition, the bill authorizes $5 million annually from 1992 through 1996 to mitigate radon in school buildings in high radon areas that have been tested.

The bill I am offering will expand our efforts to address the health threat that radon poses to our country's children. Testing and mitigating schools, where children spend hours every day, will significantly reduce their chances of contracting lung cancer. This legislation has been endorsed by both the National Education Association, the National Parent-Teacher Association, the Consumer Federation of America, the American Lung Association, and the Coalition For Consumer Health and Safety, a coalition of 20 insurance companies and associations and 16 consumer and health organizations working to improve consumer health and safety. I urge my colleagues to support this bill.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill, a section-by-section analysis, and letters from the American Lung Association and the Coalition For Consumer Health and Safety be included in the RECORD.●

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1697

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Radon Testing for Safe Schools Act".

SEC. 2. REQUIREMENT FOR NATIONWIDE RADON TESTING IN SCHOOLS.

(a) TESTING BY LOCAL EDUCATIONAL AGENCIES.—After completion of the testing required by section 307(a)(4) of the Toxic Substances Control Act (15 U.S.C. 2667(a)(4)), the Administrator shall promulgate regulations requiring each local educational agency to test each school building under the authority of the agency that is in an area identified as having elevated levels of radon. The testing required by this subsection shall be completed no later than September 30, 1993.

(b) AVAILABILITY OF RESULTS.—In the case of any school building that is tested pursuant to this section, the results of the testing shall be available in the administrative offices of the local educational agency with authority over the school building for inspection by the public, including teachers, other school personnel, and parents. The local educational agency shall notify parent, teacher, and employee organizations of the availability of such results and shall send the results to the Administrator and to the State radiation office.

SEC. 3. TESTING AND MITIGATION.

Testing required under section 2 and any radon mitigation devices and methods which are implemented as a result of such testing shall be carried out consistent with any guidelines established by the Administrator and conducted by a firm or individual which has been approved—

(1) by the Administrator pursuant to the voluntary proficiency program established pursuant to section 305(a)(2) of the Toxic Substances Control Act (15 U.S.C. 2665(a)(2)), or

(2) by a State pursuant to a State radon proficiency program.

SEC. 4. FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE.

(a) RADON TESTING AND MIGITATION ASSISTANCE PROGRAM.—There is hereby established within the Environmental Protection Agency a Radon Testing and Mitigation Assistance Program (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Assistance Program"), to provide financial assistance to implement the program established by section 2 and for any radon mitigation devices and methods determined to be necessary as a result of such testing. The Assistance Program shall be administered in accordance with this section.

(b) SUBMISSION OF APPLICATIONS.—(1) Applications for financial assistance shall be submitted by a local educational agency to the Governor, or the Governor's designee, who shall establish a priority list based on the nature and magnitude of the potential exposure to radon.

(2) Applications shall be submitted by the Governor to the Administrator who shall review and rank such applications, without regard to the public or private nature of the school involved, pursuant to subsection (c)(1) and propose financing pursuant to the financial need of the local educational agency.

(c) ADMINISTRATOR'S REVIEW.—(1) The Administrator shall review and list in priority order applications for financial assistance. In ranking applications, the Administrator shall consider—

(A) the priority assigned to the testing or mitigation program by the Governor;

(B) the nature and magnitude of the potential exposure to radon; and

(C) the extent to which the testing or mitigation proposed by the applicant is cost-effective compared to other techniques.

(2) In determining whether an applicant is eligible for assistance, and the nature and amount of financial assistance, the Administrator shall consider the financial resources available to the applicant as certified by the Governor.

(d) FINANCIAL NEED.—In no event shall financial assistance be provided under this Act to an applicant if the Administrator determines that such applicant has resources adequate to support an appropriate radon testing or mitigation program.

(e) LOANS AND GRANTS.—(1) An applicant for financial assistance may be granted a loan of up to 100 percent of the cost of a testing or mitigation program or, if the Administrator determines the applicant is unable to undertake and complete a testing or mitigation program with such a loan, such applicant may also receive a grant (alone or in combination with a loan) not to exceed 50 percent of the total cost of the testing or mitigation program, in the amount which the Administrator deems necessary.

(2) In approving any grant, the Administrator shall state with particularity the reasons why the applicant is unable to undertake and complete the testing or mitigation program with loan funds.

(f) LOAN AGREEMENTS.—Loans under this section shall be made pursuant to agreements which shall provide for the following:

(1) The loan shall not bear interest.

(2) The loan shall have a maturity period of not more than twenty years (as determined by the Administrator) and shall be repayable during such period, at such times, and in such amounts as the Administrator may specify in the loan agreement.

(3) Repayment shall be made to the Secretary of the Treasury for deposit in the general fund.

(4) Such other terms and conditions that the Administrator determines necessary to protect the financial interest of the United States.

(g) APPLICATION REQUIREMENTS.—(1) No financial assistance may be provided under this section unless an application has been submitted to the Administrator in accordance with any procedures developed by the Administrator.

(2) The Administrator shall not approve an application unless—

(A) the application contains such information as the Administrator may require, including but not limited to information describing—

(i) the nature and extent of the radon problem for which the assistance is sought;

(ii) the methods which will be used to test for or mitigate radon contamination;

(iii) the amount and type of financial assistance requested;

(iv) a description of the financial resources of the local educational agency; and

(v) a justification for the type and amount of the financial assistance requested;

(B) the application contains a certification that all activities to be conducted with the financial assistance will be performed in accordance with section 3 of this Act; and

(C) the application contains assurances that the local educational agency will furnish such information as the Administrator requires.

SEC. 5. REGULATIONS.

The Administrator shall promulgate rules and regulations as necessary to implement the authorities and requirements of this Act.

SEC. 6. ANNUAL REPORT.

During each of the six calendar years after the year in which this Act is enacted, the Administrator shall prepare and submit not later than June 1 of each year to the Committee on Environment and Public Works of the Senate and the Committee on Energy and Commerce of the House of Representatives a report on the loan and grant program authorized by section 4. The report shall—

(1) describe the number of applications received;

(2) describe the number of loans and grants made in the current calendar year and specify each applicant for and receipt of a loan or grant;

(3) specify the number of loan or grant applications which were disapproved during the current calendar year and describe the reasons for such disapprovals;

(4) describe the types of programs for which loans or grants were made;

(5) specify the estimated total costs of such programs to the recipients of loans or grants and specify the amount of loans or grants made under the assistance program; and

(6) estimate the number of schools still in need of assistance, including schools not located in an area identified as having elevated levels of radon, and the amount of resources needed by such schools, categorized by State, to mitigate all remaining school radon contamination.

SEC. 7. ENFORCEMENT.

(a) CIVIL PENALTIES.—Any local educational agency which fails to conduct the testing required pursuant to this Act or which knowingly submits false information regarding such testing to the Governor is liable for a civil penalty of not more than $500 for each day during which the violation continues. For purposes of this subsection, "violation" means a failure to comply with respect to a single school building. The court shall order that any civil penalty collected under this subsection be used by the local educational agency for purposes of complying with this subsection.

(b) AMOUNT OF PENALTY.—In determining the amount of a civil penalty to be assessed under this section against a local educational agency, the Administrator shall consider—

(1) the significance of the violation;

(2) the culpability of the violator, including any history of previous violations under this Act;

(3) the ability of the violator to pay the penalty; and

(4) the ability of the violator to continue to provide educational services to the community.

(c) ASSESSMENT OF PENALTY.—A civil penalty for a violation of this Act shall be assessed by the Administrator by an order made on the record after opportunity for a hearing in accordance with section 554 of title 5, United States Code. Before issuing such an order, the Administrator shall give written notice to the person to be assessed a civil penalty under such order of the Administrator's proposal to issue such order and provide such person an opportunity to request, within fifteen days after the date on which notice is received by such person, such a hearing on the order.

(d) MODIFICATION OF PENALTY.—The Administrator may compromise, modify, or remit, with or without conditions, any civil penalty which may be imposed under this subsection. The amount of such penalty, when finally determined, or the amount agreed upon in compromise, may be deducted from any sums owing by the United States to the person charged.

(e) JUDICIAL REVIEW.—Any person who requested in accordance with this section a hearing respecting the assessment of civil penalty and who is aggrieved by an order assessing a civil penalty may file a petition for judicial review of such order with the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit or for any other circuit in which such person resides or transacts business. Such a petition may only be filed within the thirty-day period beginning on the date the order making such assessment was issued.

(f) FAILURE TO PAY CIVIL PENALTY.—If any person fails to pay an assessment of a civil penalty—

(1) after the order making the assessment has become a final order and if such person does not file a petition for judicial review of the order in accordance with this section, or

(2) after a court in an action brought under this section has entered a final judgment in favor of the Administrator, the Attorney General shall recover the amount assessed (plus interest at currently prevailing rates from the date of the expiration of the thirty-day period referred to in subsection (e) or the date of such final judgment, as the case may be) in an action brought in any appropriate district court of the United States. In such an action, the validity, amount, and appropriateness of such penalty shall not be subject to review.

(g) CITIZEN COMPLAINTS.—Any person may file a complaint with the Administrator or with the Governor of the State in which the school building is located with respect to radon in a school building. If the Administrator or Governor receives a complaint under this subsection containing allegations which provide a reasonable basis to believe that a violation of this subsection has occurred, the Administrator or Governor shall investigate and respond (including taking enforcement action where appropriate) to the complaint within a reasonable period of time.

SEC. 8. PREEMPTION.

(a) CONSTRUCTION OF PROVISIONS AS NOT PREEMPTING OTHER LAWS.—Nothing in this Act shall be construed, interpreted, or applied to preempt, displace, or supplant any other State or Federal law, whether statutory or common.

(b) AWARD OF COSTS AND DAMAGE AWARDS.—Nothing in this Act shall be construed or interpreted to preclude any court from awarding costs and damages associated with the testing or mitigation of radon contamination, or a portion of such costs, at any time.

(c) CONSTRUCTION OF PROVISIONS AS NOT PROHIBITING MORE STRINGENT STATE REQUIREMENTS.—Nothing in this Act shall be construed or interpreted as preempting a State from establishing any liability or more stringent requirements with respect to radon in school building within such State.

(d) CREATION OF CAUSE OF ACTION.—Nothing in this Act creates a cause of action or in any other way increases or diminishes the liability of any person under any other law.

(e) EFFECT OF PROVISIONS IN CIVIL ACTIONS FOR DAMAGES.—It is not the intent of Congress that this subsection or rules, regulations, or orders issued pursuant to this subsection be interpreted as influencing, in either the plaintiff's or defendant's favor, the disposition of any civil action for damages relating to radon. This subsection does not affect the authority of any court to make a determination in any adjudicatory proceedings under applicable State law with respect to the admission into evidence or any other use of this Act or rules, regulations, or orders issued pursuant to this Act.

RADON TESTING FOR SAFE SCHOOLS ACT—SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1—Provides that the Title of the bill is the Radon Testing for Safe Schools Act.

Section 2—Requires local educational agencies in high radon areas identified by EPA pursuant to the State Radon Program Development Act of 1988 to test all their school buildings by September 30, 1993, and make those results available to the public.

Section 3—Requires that school radon testing and mitigation in high radon areas be done with devices and methods consistent with EPA guidelines and conducted by firms approved by either EPA or State proficiency programs.

Section 4—Establishes a Radon Testing and Mitigation Assistance Program for EPA to provide loans and grants to local educational agencies in high radon areas to test and mitigate their buildings.

Section 5—Requires EPA to promulgate necessary rules and regulations to implement this Act.

Section 6—Requires EPA to report to Congress annually for the next six years on the loan and grant program.

Section 7—Establishes civil penalties for local educational agencies that do not comply with the Act or that falsify testing results.

Section 8—Establishes that this bill neither preempts other State or Federal law nor prevents a State from establishing more stringent requirements with respect to radon in school buildings.

Section 9—Defined the terms "Administrator", "local educational agency", "nonprofit elementary or secondary school", "radon", and "school building".

Section 10—Authorizes $5 million to EPA for testing through September, 1993. Authorizes $5 million annually from 1992-1996 to mitigate school buildings in high radon areas that have been tested.

THE COALITION FOR CONSUMER HEALTH SAFETY,
Washington, DC, September 28, 1989.

Hon. FRANK R. LAUTENBERG,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Superfund, Ocean and Water Protection, Environment and Public Works Committee, U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR LAUTENBERG: As part of its concern about indoor air pollution, the Coalition for Consumer Health and Safety is writing to express its support of the Radon Testing for Safe School Act.

We are a coalition of 20 insurance companies and trade associations and 16 consumer and health organizations working to improve consumer health and safety. As our written Agenda explains—a copy of which we are pleased to enclose—indoor air pollution is one of the seven key issues we are focusing our efforts upon. And radon, which the Environmental Protection Agency estimates causes between 5,000 and 20,000 lung cancer deaths annually, is certainly one of the major indoor air contaminants in the country today.

Radon in school buildings, of course, is of particular concern because recent research suggests that children are even more vulnerable than adults to the hazards of radon. And testing done earlier this year by the EPA found unexpectedly high radon levels in schools in many parts of this country.

We believe that the Radon Testing for Safe Schools Act is a prudent, measured response, based on the currently available scientific evidence, to the problem of radon in schools. It does not require testing of all schools in the country, but rather only of schools in areas identified by the EPA as having elevated levels of radon. And by establishing a modest program within the EPA for the provision of loans and grants to local educational agencies in high radon areas, the legislation makes it possible for targeted schools to test for and, if necessary, mitigate hazardous radon levels.

We commend you for your leadership on this important issue.

Sincerely,

Al Parsons, American Insurance Association, David Swankin, Consumer Federation of America, Co-Chairs, Committee on Indoor Air Quality, on behalf of the Coalition for Consumer Health and Safety.

AMERICAN LUNG ASSOCIATION,
OFFICE OF GOVERNMENT RELATIONS,
Washington, DC, September 8, 1989.

Hon. FRANK LAUTENBERG,
U.S. Senate,
Hart Senate Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR LAUTENBERG: On behalf of the American Lung Association, I am writing to support legislation which you plan to introduce to require local educational agencies to conduct testing for radon contamination in schools. "The Radon Testing for Safe Schools Act" represents a significant step toward addressing and rectifying the health threat posed by radon exposure, particularly in our nation's schools.

The ALA continues to be particularly concerned that the potential for increased exposure to indoor contaminants is exacerbated by the onslaught of energy conservation techniques and efforts to reduce heating and cooling costs through the reduction of infiltration and ventilation. Radon is among the indoor pollutants of primary concern to the ALA. Others include carbon monoxide and nitrogen oxides, formaldehyde and asbestos.

The ALA also continues in its strong support for increased research on the health effects of indoor and outdoor air pollution. The increase and integration of research are essential to permitting the development of appropriate control strategy. The testing and radon mitigation activities mandated in your legislation are just as critical. We know that you share this perspective, and again, we congratulate you on the foresight shown in the introduction of the "Radon Testing for Safe Schools Act."

Sincerely,

FRAN DU MELLE,
Director.

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I would like to join my colleague from New Jersey [Mr. LAUTENBERG], in introducing the Radon Testing for Safe Schools Act of 1989.

Two years ago I introduced the Radon in Schools Detection Act, a bill which required EPA to determine the extent of radon contamination in the Nation's schools. This bill was later combined with legislation introduced by Senator MITCHELL, to form the Radon Program Development Act of 1988. The Senate unanimously approved this legislation, and it was signed into law by the President last year.

The bill we are introducing today is important because it builds on the work we began last year. It requires schools located in radom high risk areas, identified by EPA pursuant to the Radon Program Development Act, to test all their school buildings for radon by September 1993. This provision should not be onerous for a school system because radon testing is relatively inexpensive, and can be easily accomplished during a school break.

The legislation further provides a loan and/or grant program of $5 million a year for 5 years for schools which need to mitigate radon, and need financial assistance to do so. Although some mitigation work can be costly, most mitigation consists of adjustments to ventilation, installation of fans, or depressurizing and sealing a foundation. These techniques do not usually cost a great deal.

It is important that we take steps to protect our children from radon gas, which could be claiming as many as 20,000 lives per year. Radon has been identified by the Environmental Protection Agency as the largest single source of lung cancer other than smoking.

It is frightening to learn that, for several reasons, children may be more at risk from the adverse effects of radon than adults. Studies of other types of radiation indicate that children, because they are still in the developmental stages, are more susceptible to radiation damage. Also, radon experts believe that one-story elementary schools are more likely to have a radon problem than other public buildings. The problem is heightened if the school uses basement areas for cafeterias or gymnasiums. And children may receive a double exposure—at school and at home—to radon.

Mr. President, there is a real need for this legislation. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this important measure to rid our schools of the dangers posed by radon contamination.●

By Mr. GORE (for himself, Mr. FORD, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. SASSER, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. COHEN, Mr. DASCHLE, Mr. MCCONNELL, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. WARNER, and Mr. JEFFORDS):

S. 1698. A bill to amend the Communications Act of 1934 to provide for fair marketing practices for certain encrypted satellite communications; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

SATELLITE TELEVISION FAIR MARKETING ACT

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Satellite Television Fair Marketing Act, designed to finally bring a modest measure of equity to the distorted marketplace for backyard satellite dish programming and decoder equipment.

I am joined today in this initiative by Senators FORD and BUMPERS, who have devoted so much energy to this issue over the past years. In addition, I am extremely pleased to note that nine more of our colleagues have joined us as original cosponsors of the bill—Senators SASSER, PRYOR, PRESSLER, COHEN, BURDICK, DASCHLE, MCCONNELL, WARNER, and JEFFORDS. This is clear bipartisan evidence of enthusiastic support for a measure that has been debated in the Congress since 1983.

The bill is similar to S. 889 in the 100th Congress, which nearly passed the Senate. The new bill updates the remedies needed to address severe problems in the marketing of satellite dish decoding equipment.

In summary, the Satellite Television Fair Marketing Act accomplishes the following:

First. Prevents programmers from denying home dish owners access to satellite television programming;

Second. Requires satellite television programmers to establish their own criteria for distribution and provide programming to distributors on a nondiscriminatory basis. Programmers would have total flexibility to protect their product with any reasonable restrictions;

Third. Toughens the penalties for illegal piracy of satellite television programming by those who manufacture, distribute, or sell unauthorized decoder equipment;

Fourth. Authorizes the FCC to undertake action to broaden the availability of network television in rural areas currently unable to receive network signals;

Fifth. Requires the Federal Trade Commission to conduct an investigation into the pricing and distribution of satellite television programming; and Sixth. Requires the FCC to conduct an inquiry into the availability of decoders required to receive satellite television programming and specifically addresses the potential economic harrassment of owners of legal decorders who may be forced to bear the entire burden of manufacturers' costs of improving security against piracy.

During the 100th Congress, the Commerce Committee, voting 12 to 2, gave this legislation overwhelming approval, recognizing that the marketplace for satellite television programming is still distorted and anticompetitive. Committee hearings revealed vigorous efforts by many in the cable industry to restrain the growth of the satellite dish industry and the work of those trying to bring programming to dish owners at a fair price.

Since 1984 concentration of ownership in the cable industry has drastically increased. In 1985, 50 cable companies controlled 70 percent of cable subscribing. In 1989, 20 companies control 70 percent of the market. Of those 20 companies, only 10 control 54 percent of the market. These same 10 companies also own the largest and most popular programming services. It is not a coincidence that in the 2½ years after programmers began scrambling signals, not a single noncable distributor was allowed to serve dish owners.

The National Rural Telecommunications Cooperative has been allowed to sell these services only if they restrict sales to areas served by electric cooperatives, under terms favorable to cable companies within those areas.

The NRTC deal is an extremely minor concession to home dish owners—and no concession at all to the majority of dish owners who will not be able to buy the NRTC services because of the restrictive, anticompetitive contracts. Our colleagues should not be misled by claims from opponents of the legislation that the NRTC contract is a "breakthrough" or "evidence that the marketplace is working fine."

The fact is, in May before the Senate Commerce Committee the NRTC cited massive distortions and anticompetitive practices of many programming services and called for legislative intervention to bring about honest third-party program distribution. Again in June, Bob Phillips, the chief executive officer of NRTC, reported to the committee that the NRTC pays up to 444 percent more than small cable systems for the same programming. The NRTC, despite being heralded as the solution to the anticompetitive practices in the industry, cannot obtain programming at reasonable terms and rates.

For a variety of reasons, cable companies have refused to serve the overwhelming majority of home dish owners, most of whom live in rural areas. Instead, home dish owners have paid thousands for their receiving equipment, only to be subjected to continuing barriers to competition. It is clearly the right of cable programmers to protect their signals, but they have consistently acted in concert with major cable corporations to prevent the evolution of a competitive programming marketplace for home dish owners.

In addition to continuing problems in the programming distribution marketplace, consumers are facing massive confusion and potential unfair cost burdens if they are forced to pay for security upgrades by the manufacturers. The legal decoders currently in use cost several hundred dollars, and they may be forced to pay much more to upgrade their decoders to meet the manufacturers new security procedures. Improving decoder security is important and necessary, but owners of legal decoders should not have to pay for the manufacturer's inability to supply secure equipment. This bill requires the FCC to undertake an inquiry to produce a remedy for this likely and unfair consumer burden.

The Satellite Television Fair Marketing Act is a modest effort to correct—without heavy handed Federal regulation—the vast inequities in the satellite television marketplace.

Mr. President, there are more than 25 million Americans living in rural areas who suffer poor off-air reception. Many of these families are also denied access to cable services. The time has come for the Congress to ensure that these families will not be denied the informational services they need and deserve.

As I noted earlier, this is a bipartisan effort. Many of our colleagues on both sides have spoken eloquently on the problems facing home satellite dish owners as well as cable customers. For instance, I ask unanimous consent that the RECORD include a column by Senator PRESSLER, who has also introduced legislation in this area at the end of my statement.

We encourage our colleagues to take a close look at the Satellite Television Fair Marketing Act. We believe it is a reasonable, moderate approach requiring no new regulatory measures. Instead, it takes the commonsense view that—if you sell satellite television programming, you should do it in a nondiscriminatory manner. And, if you manufacture satellite television decoder equipment, you should not force consumers of legal equipment to bear the entire burden for measures to secure that equipment.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1698

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress Assembled.

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Satellite Television Fair Marketing Act".

FAIR MARKETING OF CERTAIN SATELLITE COMMUNICATIONS

SEC. 2. Section 705 of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 605) is amended—

(1) by redesignating subsections (c), (d), and (e) as subsections (d), (e), and (f), respectively; and

(2) by inserting after subsection (b) the following new subsection:

"(c)(1) Any person who encrypts any satellite cable programming for private viewing shall—

"(A) make such programming available for private viewing by home satellite antenna users; and

"(B) when making such programming available through any other person, establish reasonable financial and character criteria under which distributors may qualify to distribute such programming to home satellite antenna users and not discriminate between the distribution of such programming to distributors for cable television subscribers and distributors for satellite antenna users, nor among different distributors offering similar distribution services to home satellite antenna users, except that this subparagraph shall remain in force for a period not to exceed 5 years after the date of enactment of this subparagraph.

"(2) No person shall promote, manufacture, market, or sell equipment which enables or assists in enabling the reception of encrypted satellite delivered programming without the authorization of the person encrypting such programming.

"(3) Any person aggrieved by any violation of paragraph (1)(A) of this subsection may bring a civil action, against any other person who encrypts any satellite cable programming for private viewing, in a United States district court or in any other court of competent jurisdiction. Such court may grant temporary and final injunctions or other equitable relief on such terms as it may deem reasonable and appropriate to prevent or restrain such violations.

"(4) Any person aggrieved by any violation of paragraph (1)(B) or (2) of this subsection may bring, in any United States district court or other court of competent jurisdiction, a civil action against any other person who encrypts any satellite cable programming for private viewing and unreasonably discriminates among distributors. Such court may—

"(A) grant temporary and final injunctions on such terms as it may deem reasonable and appropriate to prevent or restrain such violations; and

"(B) direct the recovery of full costs to a prevailing plaintiff, including actual damages, or statutory damages for all violations in a sum of not more than $500,000, as the court considers just.

"(5) As used in this subsection, the term—

"(A) 'satellite delivered programming' means video programming transmitted by a domestic communications satellite intended for reception by cable television system subscribers and does not include the signal of an affiliate of a national broadcast network that is retransmitted by satellite or any internal satellite communication of any broadcaster or broadcaster network; and

"(B) 'reasonable financial and character criteria' means commonly prudent business standards designed to facilitate payment to the programmer and maintenance of the business reputation of the programmer, and which are designed to facilitate the existence of multiple noncable distributors.".

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION NOTICE OF INQUIRY INTO DECODER AVAILABILITY

SEC. 3. (a) The Federal Communications Commission shall undertake a notice of inquiry into the degree to which consumers are being unreasonably denied access to satellite television programming as a result of the price or availability of satellite television decoding equipment.

(b) Such an inquiry shall examine—

(1) the economic impact on consumers resulting from manufacturers' measures to secure encryption technologies in existing and future devices required to receive satellite television programming:

(2) whether lack of competition in the manufacture of home satellite television encryption equipment has produced artificially high consumer prices for such equipment; and

(3) whether a single manufacturing licensing source restricts the evolution of competition among various providers of such equipment to distributors, retail entities, and consumers.

(c) The Commission shall include the development and integration of satellite television encryption and transmission standards in any current and future inquiries regarding high definition television technologies.

(d) The Commission shall complete such inquiry not later than 120 days following the effective date of this Act.

(e) The Commission shall conduct a semiannual review and report to Congress on the effect of decoder price and availability on the ability of consumers to receive satellite television programming.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION INVESTIGATION INTO PROGRAM MARKETING PRACTICES

SEC. 4. (a) The Federal Trade Commission shall conduct and complete an investigation within 120 days following the effective date of this Act into the pricing and distribution terms and practices of persons selling satellite television programming to home satellite antenna owners to determine whether the market for such programming is developing competitively.

(b) Should the Federal Trade Commission determine, after such investigation, that this market is not developing competitively, it is empowered to establish any remedies, which it deems necessary to produce adequate competition for such programming.

AVAILABILITY OF NETWORK PROGRAMMING TO RURAL AREAS

SEC. 5. The Federal Communications Commission shall initiate a rulemaking to facilitate, to the maximum possible extent, the provision of network broadcasting signals to persons unable to adequately receive a signal over the air from a local licensee. In undertaking such rulemaking, the Commission shall take into consideration the following:

(1) the extent to which individuals in rural, underserved areas are unable to receive broadcast television transmissions;

(2) the extent to which existing Federal rules have prevented local broadcast entities from providing signals to such persons unable to adequately receive a signal over the air from a local licensee;

(3) the potential for serving these persons, and others who cannot receive such transmissions, using home antennas to receive satellite-delivered network programming which might be otherwise encrypted to prevent private reception; and

(4) methods by which network programmers may protect certain portions of satellite-transmitted signals not intended for public viewing, while providing unencrypted signals to those persons living outside Grade B contours as defined by the Commission.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 6. The foregoing provisions of this Act shall take effect upon the expiration of the 30-day period following the date of its enactment.

CABLE TELEVISION RATES ARE OUT OF CONTROL

(By Larry Pressler)

South Dakotans are upset about sky rocketing cable television rates. They should be. As I traveled around South Dakota this summer, I heard more and more about the rising cost of cable television. Local governments feel helpless since they are not allowed to regulate rates. People want action.

I serve as a member of the Senate Subcommittee on Communications. We held hearings in June and will conduct a more extensive investigation this fall (probably in October) to find the best solution to this problem.

DOUBLE MONOPOLY

A number of bills aimed at ensuring reasonably priced, quality programming to the public have been introduced in this session of Congress. I authored the first. Some propose returning rate regulation to the cities. This may be necessary. But the underlying problem in the cable TV industry is monopolization.

A small handful of the largest cable companies in the country enjoy a monopoly on not only the cable franchises, but also the most popular programs on which other cable operators depend. These multi-system operators (MSOs) have too much power. The largest MSO, Tele-Communications Inc. (TCI), controls approximately one out of every five cable subscribers in the U.S. It also owns or has a substantial interest in a large number of programmers, including The Discovery Channel, American Movie Classics, Black Entertainment Television, Cable Value Network and TBS.

Time-Warner owns both American Television and Communications Corporations (ATC), the country's second largest MSO, and HBO and Cinemax, two of the most popular movie channels.

Viacon, another large cable MSO, owns or has a substantial interest in Showtime, The Movie Channel, MTV, VH-1, Nickelodeon, Lifetime and TBS.

PROGRAM COSTS ARE THE KEY

Because of this cross-ownership, the large MSOs have ready access at reasonable rates to the programming which they control. This is called "volume discounting." They also dictate the prices other, smaller cable operators will be charged for programming. Small, independent cable companies, such as most of those in South Dakota cannot get "volume discounts" and in many cases pay twice as much or more for this premium programming. Of course, this is passed on to the consumer.

Cable customers want HBO. They want MTV. The small cable company must deliver this programming. The programmers know they can charge what they want and get it. The large MSOs that own these programmers get "volume discounts," but their customers don't see the benefits. Very few communities have competing cable systems, so these MSOs can charge what they want.

The profits from high rates in small towns are passed through the local cable company to the programmer, which is owned by an MSO. The profits from high rates in towns served by MSOs go to those MSOs. An oligopoly of several large MSOs controls the industry.

PRESSLER PROPOSALS

Perhaps rate regulation by local communities would help solve this problem. But I also believe that the problem needs to be attacked at its root.

I was the first to introduce legislation regulating the cable industry in this Congress. My legislation, S. 168, the Cable Television Programming Competition and Consumer Protection Act of 1989, would require programmers to sell their programming to all programming retailers at comparable rates, thus eliminating the discriminatory practice of "volume discounting." It also would attack the practice of exclusive distributorships, often used by programmers to deny their programming to competitors of cable, such as "wireless cable" operators.

Also, I have advocated a Teddy Roosevelt style of trust-busting which would prohibit cross-ownership of cable and programming interests. What we need to do is break up the stranglehold that the large MSOs have on the cable programming and delivery industry. We need a truly competitive marketplace.

'WIRELESS' CABLE ALTERNATIVE

I have not been relying on legislation alone to correct this problem. For the last five years, I have worked to bring to South Dakota a new technology called "wireless cable." This allows farm and ranch families and residents of very small towns to have access to the same type of programming available through traditional wired cable in the larger towns. Working with REA cooperatives and private industry, we have met with some success.

The Mitchell area has had wireless cable for about four years now. Over the last year, I have helped six additional wireless cable broadcasting sites get on the air in South Dakota. As a result, our state now leads the nation in the availability of cable programming to rural areas. Nearly the entire eastern third of the state is covered. I was proud to attend the ceremonies at Bath and Colman inaugurating the services there.

But wireless cable faces a similar problem to that faced by the small cable companies in South Dakota—availability and price of programming. In the case of wireless cable, programmers sometimes simply refuse to sell their product. It is a frustrating problem. There have been some successes, but some popular programming, such as HBO, still is not available to rural wireless cable companies.

The best answer to the problem of rising cable rates is to have truly effective competition. That does not exist today. I believe that legislation of some sort is necessary to create that type of effective competition, and will be working in the Senate to see that it is enacted.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I stand today to speak in support of the Satellite Television Fair Marketing Act introduced by the distinguished Senator from the State of Tennessee, Senator GORE.

As my colleagues will recall, Senator GORE has been in the forefront of the effort to bring competition into the satellite television programming marketplace. For the past 5 years Senator GORE has championed legislation that is not designed nor intended to regulate programmers or cable companies but merely to provide the 2 million home dish owners, over 40,000 in Arkansas alone, with affordable satellite programming. I am proud to again be an original cosponsor of this bill as I was in the last Congress.

This proposal was only narrowly defeated last year when it was attempted to be added as an amendment to the Technical Corrections Act. The margin of defeat that day was only 7 votes and with 21 members not voting, I believe the prospects for passage this year as a freestanding bill are much better.

Mr. President, I became interested in this bill after I began hearing from many of my constituents who own a home satellite dish and have been unable to purchase a fair and affordable package of program services.

Keep in mind, these folks for the most part live in the rural areas of Arkansas and have invested a large part of their hard-earned and limited incomes on purchasing the dish itself. Assuming they have located a program package and can afford it, they must also purchase an upgraded security decoder, about $400, to enable them to make the dish operable. This whole process represents a sizable financial investment for rural folks who oftentimes must install a satellite dish in order to receive any over-the-air television signals. It is unfortunate that these people must go through such effort and expense to secure basic television service, but what is more unfortunate as well as unfair is that these home dish owners are apparently being denied a fair market price for the purchase of premium program services such as HBO, Cinemax, Showtime, etc.

Why are programmers charging higher rates to dishowners for their package of services? Why do dish-owners pay one rate and cable subscriber's another? Hearings held last year by the Senate Commerce Committee on this subject showed that a very intimate relationship exists between the major programmers and the big cable companies. I am not going to go so far as to suggest that there is a true monopoly or that there have been antitrust violations, but apparently the cable television industry exerts enough control over the premium programmers to prevent independent non-cable distributors from competing.

Everyone is aware of the fact that consumers are held hostage by high prices when no competition exists. Those in control take advantage of their superior position knowing that in the absence of competition, they may charge whatever they wish. This is exactly what has happened and is happening in the for-pay television industry. Home satellite dish owners who want to purchase premium programming are being charged significantly higher rates for these services than are cable subscribers. This is done because of the considerable influence wielded by the cable companies over the programmers, an influence that is due very often to the fact that the cable companies and programmers are both part of a very large corporate conglomerate.

There are certain industries and markets that must be regulated by Government but I think most folks would generally agree that it is in everyone's best interest to leave market forces to their own devices. In this case, however, it is quite evident that the market is being manipulated, not totally, but to the extent that some limited congressional action is necessary to promote a more vigorous and efficient marketplace. This bill will do just that by eliminating the current programmers pro cable bias.

To assure competition, this legislation spells out to the HBO's, ESPN's, Cinemax's and so forth, that if you provide your programs for cable customers and also offer them for distribution for satellite dishes, no discrimination between the two type distributors may occur.

There are other provisions which will enhance the ability of satellite dish owners to secure dependable, affordable satellite television programming. For example, it prevents programmers from denying home dish owners access to satellite television programming as well as requiring the Federal Communications Commission to conduct an inquiry into the availability of decoders required to receive satellite television programming. Additional language calls for the Federal Trade Commission to conduct an investigation into the pricing and distribution of satellite television programming.

Mr. President, I realize that some of my colleagues believe this bill represents an unwarranted Federal Government intrusion into the free enterprise marketplace. They feel as though given enough time competition will eventually evolve and they may be correct. However, I do not believe that to be a realistic expectation given the present conditions that exist in the for-pay television industry. While I am sensitive to the charge of unnecessary Federal involvement, the prevailing circumstances call for some type of intervention.

The Satellite Television Fair Marketing Act represents a moderate and fair approach to resolving a problem that in my opinion can only grow worse. I applaud the persistence and determination of my friend from Tennessee to come to the aid of satellite dish owners everywhere and urge my colleagues to support this worthy legislation.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, many rural residents have spent hundreds or even thousands of dollars on satellite dishes and descramblers to receive good reception of network television shows and other programming. I have heard from many dish owners who complain that cable companies and programming services are shutting them out with higher rates, expensive new descramblers or other barriers. Service to rural customers is slipping in many areas while cable companies rush to add urban subscribers to their systems. I can understand why rural dish owners are upset. Despite their investment, they can't take for granted that they will continue to enjoy good television reception and their favorite programming.

I believe all consumers deserve access to reliable, reasonably-priced programming, whether they receive their signal off the airwaves, through cable, or by satellite dish. There is a need for legislation to encourage competition in the expanding market for cable and satellite dish television consumers and to establish fair marketing practices for these services. The Satellite Television Fair Marketing Act being introduced by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee addressed many of these inequities. I am pleased to be a cosponsor of his legislation.

I would like to share with my colleagues an article by Bob Phillips of the National Rural Telecommunications Cooperative. I ask unanimous consent that the article from the September 1989 North Dakota REC magazine be printed in the RECORD at this point. Thank you.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SATELLITES DISH UP TV AND RURAL DISCRIMINATION

(By Bob Phillips)

It's an increasingly common rural American story—geographical discrimination.

Railroads abandon all but the most lucrative main lines. Rural educational opportunities for bright young students shrink with declining populations. Country hospitals close and life-saving health care lags behind urban centers. Without farm-supply co-ops, some communities would not even have a gasoline station. And in North Dakota, airline service cut-backs mean you must fly through Minneapolis to go from Bismarck to Fargo.

Even the simple delivery of a clear off-air television signal has not been improved in many rural areas since the advent of this powerful medium. Only with the development of the home satellite dish did the picture brighten for TV viewers in the vast reaches of rural America.

In the late 1970s, the satellite dish opened the new world of broadcasting, taking rural consumers from one or two channels of reception to 100. Although rural America was devastated by increasing geographical isolation in many service areas, at least there was an opportunity to bring equal television access to rural consumers over the backyard dish.

For the past two years, the rural utility-owned National Rural Telecommunications Cooperative (NRTC) has been nationally distributing network, superstation and cable programming services to rural consumers through 300 rural electric and rural telephone systems. Today, it serves 35,000 rural families. And it's brought a rural voice to a market controlled by urban interests unfamiliar with the needs of rural areas.

NRTC is a strong supporter of satellite delivery of educational, informational and entertainment programming to the home. Major manufacturers have solved many early problems of equipment quality and ease of use. And, system prices have come down to more affordable levels.

But while the equipment improves, the market for rural consumers has not. Based on our experiences, we must conclude that today, rural satellite dish owners are suffering unjust discrimination in access and pricing of the same video products delivered over urban cable systems.

On June 21, I testified before the U.S. Senate Commerce Committee as the only representative of the home dish satellite industry on the issue of cable television control and its effect on competitive technologies such as the home dish market.

I told the committee that cable service will never reach 10 million rural homes. We cited examples where cable has thwarted the development of the home satellite dish market because the dish system poses a perceived threat to cable systems—despite the fact a home satellite dish is the only way these millions of rural homes will ever receive access to today's television.

I gave specific cases where rural home satellite dish owners are paying four or five times more a month to receive programming compared to prices paid by cable homes. I told the committee that NRTC pays 444 percent more than small cable systems for the same programming.

And I cautioned that, left unchecked, the highly concentrated power of the cable industry will further thwart the generation of smaller and more affordable direct broadcast satellites because they, too, pose a threat to cable systems.

These issues—combined with general instability in the dealer base and lingering local stories of poor equipment equality—have thwarted consumer interest in technology that holds great promise for rural residents.

Access is a key element in rural development, whether it's access to information, education or entertainment. It's integral to practical applications such as rural education and important to the quality of life. Certainly, with 98 percent of all households owning at least one set, television is a universal service. And it will not diminish in importance.

Throughout the nation, rural electric and rural telephone systems are beginning their efforts to make satellite television available to rural consumers in fair and affordable ways. NRTC has only begun its work to assist and help rural utilities bring universal television access to rural areas. Television cannot be another area where rural Americans suffer from geographical discrimination. Nor should its distribution be controlled by large entities who view rural America as the market of last resort.

I ask that you consider satellite television as a real option. But whether you do or not, support the effort of those Rural TV electric and telephone co-ops in North Dakota who are building a base of fair and affordable television for the future.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, once again, I am pleased to join Senator GORE and my other distinguished colleagues in introducing the Satellite Telecommunications Fair Marketing Act. This bill amends section 705 of the Communications Act of 1934 and is vital to ensure that the public interest is served by a fully competitive market in the direct satellite broadcast market.

The debate on this issue rages on, year in and year out. For nearly 5 years now, the Senate has debated the merits of legislative proposals aimed at restoring some equity and fairness in the market for satellite programming and decoder equipment. I hope the Senate will exercise sound judgment and pass this legislation.

While many people have mistaken the satellite dish to be the State flower of Arkansas, I assure my colleagues that it is the apple blossom. But, there are approximately 2.6 million home satellite dish owners across our Nation and over 35,000 in Arkansas. Currently, 5 million Americans depend on satellite dishes to receive programming, and 80 percent of the dishes are in rural areas. Unlike their city counterparts, rural dwellers are not able to pick up the phone and call the local cable company to request service. In fact, there are 20 to 30 million Americans living in rural areas who suffer poor off-air reception and will never be served by cable.

These citizens have two legitimate concerns: First, assured access to satellite-delivered cable programming; and second, a fair and reasonable price. Consumers in rural America aren't asking for a Federal giveaway. They simply want the benefits that reasonable and very minimal Government regulations would provide. This legislation provides those assurances.

Every year, I listen to opponents of this legislation make claims that fair conditions for satellite-delivered programming will evolve. But another year has passed, and the current market for scrambled television programming continues to be unfair and confusing. After 5 years of review, analysis, and marketplace observation, the public interest is still not being served. The market continues to be distorted by dominant forces and actively manipulated by the supply of programming and hardware.

The chief executive officer of the National Rural Telecommunications Cooperative [NRTC], Bob Phillips, delivered some very distressing testimony to the Senate Subcommittee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation earlier this year, but it doesn't surprise me. He noted that satellite dish sales are down by 40 percent, attributing the decline to consumer confusion about the legality, access, and cost associated with satellite dishes. The consumer fright which developed after scrambling began in 1985 was inevitable. Satellite dish sales have failed to adequately recover from the scare. This has been a serious problem in Arkansas where satellite manufacturers and retailers are an endangered species.

Perhaps the most troubling and clearest evidence of market distortion was Mr. Phillips testimony about programming price discrimination. He stated that NRTC's wholesale cost for its basic package is, on average 444 percent higher than the wholesale cost to cable for the same programming. Given this tremendous disparity. I think any argument that the satellite dish programming market is evolving and working efficiently is pure hogwash. I agree with those who claim that the huge gaps in wholesale prices is directly linked to the vertical integration of programmers, satellite carriers, and large cable operators.

Without effective competition, prices for scrambled programming will remain much higher than the reasonable price that would be available in a truly competitive market. In addition, some scrambled satellite programming is not available at any price. These continued discriminatory practices in access and pricing for scrambled programming do not encourage market efficiency at all, and it is not sound policy for the Senate to allow these market distortions to continue. The result of these practices is detrimental to both rural satellite dish owners as well as programmers.

I do not support, condone, or encourage pirating or scrambled programming. With the current conditions in the home dish market, however, it is not surprising that some dish owners resort to these illegal practices. Creating a competitive market for scrambled programming would lead to a decrease in the illegal theft of signals, and I strongly support the piracy provisions in this legislation. The Senate should end this self-defeating process in the marketplace and foster competition in this arena.

Another important issue this legislation tackles is the availability of decoders. There are serious questions of decoder distribution policy. I also strongly support the provision in this legislation mandating an inquiry by the Federal Communications Commission into the potential economic harassment of the owners of legal decoders who may be forced to shoulder the entire burden of manufacturers' costs of improving security against piracy.

Mr. President, a person doesn't have to be a psychic to see the many problems still confronting home satellite dish owners. And a person doesn't need to be a doctor to figure out the cure for those problems. A little common sense is all it takes.

I continue to receive daily calls from dissatisfied consumers, both from my constituents in Arkansas and from dish owners across the Nation.

I continue to see evidence of active market manipulation.

I continue to find a concentration of industry.

I continue to find a lack of competition.

The legislation we have introduced will provide an adequate remedy to these ills.

In summary, this legislation accomplishes two objectives which are critical to a stable, fair, and competitive cable television market: First, it establishes a right of access to scrambled programming under competitive market conditions that rural satellite television antenna owners should have under section 705 of the Cable Communications Act of 1984; and second, it takes an essential first step toward allowing a truly competitive market for scrambled television signals to flourish.

Senator GORE has described the details of this bill, and I don't see the need to repeat them now. But I do know this is not a problem that will disappear.

For the record, let me remind my colleagues that the Commerce Committee overwhelmingly approved similar legislation during the 100th Congress, and I am sure that the members of the committee will approve this bill as well. Rural Americans deserve nothing less. They should not have to suffer under the heavy-hand of unfair competition just because they live in a rural area.

I urge the Senate to pass the Satellite Television Fair Marketing Act and to begin the process of acknowledging and protecting the rights of satellite television antenna owners.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. President, in my scenic hometown of Shrewsbury, which is nestled by the beautiful green mountains of Vermont, we depend as do many Vermonters on satellite dishes to receive television programming.

For this personal reason, as well as for compelling professional reasons, today I am proud to be an original cosponsor of the Satellite Television Fair Marketing Act. This legislation is designed to create a fair marketplace for backyard satellite dish programming and decoder equipment. I was a cosponsor of earlier similar legislation and I am more confirmed than ever in my belief that it is needed and necessary.

The Satellite Television Fair Marketing Act prevents programmers from denying home dish owners access to satellite television programming, provides programming to distributors on a nondiscriminatory basis, and tightens the penalties for illegal piracy of satellite television programming by those who manufacture, distribute, or sell unauthorized decoder equipment.

The bill also authorizes the FCC to undertake action to broaden the availability of network television in rural areas not now able to receive network signals, and requires the FCC to conduct an inquiry into the pricing and distribution of satellite television programming.

Very importantly, this legislation addresses the potential economic harassment of owners of legal decoders who may be forced to bear the entire burden of manufacturers' costs of improving security against piracy. It also requires an FCC investigation of the availability of these decoders.

At this time, Mr. President, I would like to urge all of my colleagues to support the Satellite Television Fair Marketing Act. This would make it possible for all communities, not only rural ones, to receive satellite television transmission on a fair and equitable basis.

● Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, today I rise as an original cosponsor of the Satellite Television Fair Marketing Act. I am in wholehearted support of Senator GORE's bill and commend my colleague from Tennessee for once again offering this important legislation. In my State alone, there are approximately 36,000 satellite dish owners.

Over the past 5 years I have visited every county and held town meetings across the entire Commonwealth of Kentucky. During those visits, one of the questions I was most frequently asked was "What is going to be done about scrambling?" Many rural Kentuckians who will never be hooked up to cable and have purchased expensive dishes are concerned that they will be denied access by scrambling or that the cost of the monthly service fee will be prohibitive, thereby rendering their investment worthless.

As I have said numerous times, the problem is no longer the issue of scrambling; most dish owners recognize the right of programmers to scramble their signals. They are resigned to the fact that they must purchase a decoder and are willing to pay a monthly charge as long as the fee is reasonable and fair. In my opinion, that is where the problem exists. Current market constraints are preventing the delivery of competitively priced programming.

I believe that this legislation is eminently fair and is not a "knee jerk" reaction to the problem. While some individuals feel that this represents overregulation of the satellite television marketplace, it simply represents a good faith attempt to ensure that home dish owners receive fair and equitable pricing of programming. It is important to note that this bill still allows programmers to have flexibility in protecting their product by using reasonable restrictions and strengthens the penalties for illegal piracy of programming by those who, manufacture, distribute, or sell unauthorized decoder equipment. Certainly, these are very reasonable provisions.

While I was disappointed that this legislation failed to pass last year, I was hopeful this delay would give programmers the opportunity to follow through in allowing third parties to distribute their signals to rural dish owners. However, this did not occur. I recognize that program packages are now available, but I think everyone agrees that more can be done. For this reason, I strongly support this legislation and again urge my Senate colleagues to support expedited passage of the Satellite Television Fair Marketing Act.●

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I would like to add my voice in support of the legislation introduced today by Senator GORE, myself, and nine other Members of the Senate. The Satellite Television Fair Marketing Act is an attempt to introduce some fair play into the home satellite dish programming market.

I was a strong supporter of last year's version of this legislation. That bill was defeated near the end of the session by a vote of 43 to 36. Twenty-one Senators were not present. I would hope that this year's bill will be allowed to come to the floor in a manner that would permit a vote of the full membership, who, I believe, would now support such legislation.

This legislation does several things. First, it requires satellite television programmers to establish their own criteria for programming distribution and then sell their programming on a nondiscriminatory basis to those distributors who meet those criteria. The programmers say that this is unnecessary, that this is already being done. The famous National Rural Telecommunications Cooperative [NRTC] deal of last year is used to try to prove the point. But the NRTC itself, in testimony before the Commerce Committee this spring, stated that third-party program distribution was not developing any further, and that programming is not being provided at reasonable terms and rates to the NRTC.

Perhaps the situation is improving. It is improving with regard to wireless cable in South Dakota. Within the last year, two rural wireless cable companies that had been seeking programming from ESPN worked out contracts. In addition, HBO agreed to sell its programming to another wireless cable company in the State that had been seeking HBO's programming for the last 4 years. So I have seen some progress within one technology. But before I'm willing to say that the marketplace is working properly, we need to see some improvement across the board. I don't think that is happening yet.

Second, the legislation requires the Federal Communications Commission to conduct an inquiry into the availability of decoders. There is a great concern among backyard satellite dish owners over the possibility of being forced to bear the entire cost of improving decoder security against piracy through the purchase of new decoders and improvements to old decoders. It is essential that the FCC investigate this situation.

Third, the bill requires the FCC to act to broaden the availability of network television in rural areas currently unable to receive network signals. Satellite-transmitted network programming should be unencrypted for those persons living outside of the range of broadcast network television.

This legislation also requires the FTC to investigate the pricing and distribution of satellite television programming, and increases the penalties for illegal piracy of satellite television programming.

As I traveled around my home State of South Dakota this summer, I kept hearing about skyrocketing cable television rates. People are upset and local governments feel helpless to do anything about it. One of the primary reasons for high cable rates is the vertical integration in the cable television and cable programming industry. That vertical integration results in higher prices for the programming sold to small independent cable operators as well as third-party satellite television distributors and other competing technologies, such as wireless cable.

The large multisystem operators [MSO's], such as Tele-Communications Inc., and American Television and Communications Corp., receive what is known as volume discounts from their programming suppliers, who are owned in part or in whole by these MSO's or their mutual parent companies. Independent cable companies and competing technologies pay more for the same programming, sometimes twice as much or more.

I have advanced in the past a Teddy Roosevelt style of trust-busting which would prohibit cross-ownership of cable and programming interests. We need somehow to break the stranglehold of the large MSO's on the cable programming and delivery industry. We need a truly competitive marketplace. This legislation would help accomplish that worthwhile objective.

By Mr. HARKIN (for himself, Mr. CONRAD, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. DASCHLE, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. FOWLER, Mr. GLENN, and Mr. SIMON):

S. 1699. A bill to provide financial assistance to conduct agricultural research and to commercialize such research, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

ALTERNATIVE AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH AND COMMERCIALIZATION ACT OF 1989

● Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, it is with particular pleasure that I rise today, along with my colleague Senator HARKIN and our cosponsors, to introduce the Alternative Agricultural Research and Commercialization Act of 1989. This bill is the culmination of vigorous efforts by myself and Senator HARKIN to establish a Federal commitment to the development and commercialization of new nonfood, nonfeed, industrial uses for agricultural commodities. I want to commend Senator HARKIN for his extraordinary leadership on this issue.

This bill is intended to bridge a serious gap that impedes the ability of American industries to develop and commercialize new industrial products derived from our farm and forest products. In simple terms, there are three obstacles to commercialization: Long-term high risk, financing, and coordination. This landmark legislation would, for the first time, coordinate the efforts of the Federal, State, and private sectors to develop and commercialize new industrial products, help bridge the financing gap, and take on part of the initial risk.

This legislation combines two bills: S. 621 and S. 1387. S. 621 establishes the Agricultural Research Commercialization Corporation, which we have renamed in the bill we are introducing today as the Alternative Agricultural Research and Commercialization Corporation [AARCC]. It would provide business financing and technical assistance to businesses seeking to commercialize new industrial uses. It would also coordinate the efforts of the Federal, State, and private sectors that necessarily play a role in commercialization. AARCC is modeled after the highly successful Corporation for Science and Technology, a State-chartered government agency in Indianapolis, IN. AARCC has earned the support of the National Governors Association, the National Association of State Departments of Agriculture, the National Association of Development Organizations, and National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, and numerous farm and commodity groups. It is also supported by universities and researchers around the country.

I first introduced AARCC in the 100th Congress as S. 2413. We met with considerable success in moving this important legislation. I held three hearings on the legislation while I was chairman of the Subcommittee on Agricultural Credit and General Legislation. My colleagues on the Senate Agriculture Committee agreed to include it in S. 1729, the Rural Economy Act. Unfortunately, that bill was not reported out of committee.

In the House, Congressman TIM PENNY introduced AARCC, and we succeeded in passing it in the House as part of H.R. 5056, the Agricultural Research Act of 1988.

Senator HARKIN's legislation, S. 1387, establishes a Peer-Reviewed Research Grant Program to provide much-needed funding for the development of new industrial uses. His bill was first introduced in the 100th Congress and overwhelmingly passed the Senate three times.

Mr. President, many Members are familiar with the potential use of new industrial products derived from agricultural and forestry commodities. Many of our traditional agricultural commodities—corn, soybeans, sunflowers, and rapeseed—and new crops—kenaf, meadowfoam, crambe, and guayule, for example—can be used to produce substances which replace chemicals and other industrial products currently derived from nonrenewable resources, much of which we import. These products include plastics from cornstarch, paints and transmission fluid from rapeseed, and nylon from meadowfoam.

Many Members are also familiar with the potential of new industrial products development to overcome two serious national problems—the economic decline of our rural communities and the failure to fully develop and commercialize the fruits of our agricultural research. They know that the development and commercialization of these products will: First, create new jobs in manufacturing, processing, and management; second, increase the demand for agricultural and forestry crops, benefiting rural businesses and communities; and reducing the need for Federal crop subsidies; third, make us more competitive in the world economy, reducing our trade deficit; and fourth, provide industrial products derived from renewable resources which are safer for the environment.

AARCC establishes a national policy to make this potential a reality. For the first time, we will match the efforts of our competitors in Japan and elsewhere, who, supported by their governments, are very successful in commercializing new technologies.

How will AARCC work?

AARCC will establish a vital partnership between the Federal Government, private industry, universities, and State and local governments to overcome the financial and technical barriers to development and commercialization of new uses. It will establish the Agricultural Research Commercialization Corporation within the U.S. Department of Agriculture. AARCC will be headed by a Board of Directors, appointed by the Secretaries of Agriculture and Commerce and the Director of the National Science Foundation. This Board has two primary responsibilities. First, it shall recommend peer-reviewed "new uses" research proposals to the Secretary of Agriculture for funding. These proposals shall be evaluated on the basis of their potential to modify a plant or its material to produce an industrial product, their potential to develop or enhance production methods for these products, and the potential market size for the product, along with other criteria.

Second, the Board shall make the final evaluation and decision on whether and how to fund commercialization project applications. It shall establish regional centers around the country which will: First, develop a network of experts who must play a role in the commercialization of agricultural research; and second, provide financial assistance and business and technical guidance to companies seeking to commercialize new industrial products.

These four to nine regional centers will be responsible for providing financial assistance to carefully screened commercialization projects. This assistance can be used for all aspects of the commercialization process, from prototype testing and market development to factory construction and worker training. The products to be commercialized may be the result of research projects funded by AARCC.

AARCC will assume part of the initial risk of these commercialization ventures. It will help finance commercialization projects through low-interest loans, loan guarantees, convertible debentures, repayable grants matched by other funds, and umbrella bonding. This financing does not compete with private financial institutions. Instead, it fills a financing gap in the early growth period of innovative firms. In fact, I have learned that such early public financing actually attracts private venture capital which would not be available otherwise.

Each regional center will accept applications from companies or other entities seeking to commercialize new industrial products and processes using agricultural and forestry commodities. Applications will be evaluated for scientific soundness, technical feasibility, and market potential. Applicants must also demonstrate that they have committed their own resources to the project. They must show that adequate private sector funding is not available without AARCC participation. Proposals demonstrating that matching funds are available from the public or private sector will receive priority.

Finally, each applicant must show that once started, the business project can be self-sustaining. AARCC is designed to provide short-term assistance to get a company off the ground—not perpetual aid.

Regional centers will develop a network of experts from the scientific, financial, managerial, engineering, agricultural, and marketing sectors. This network will review proposals and provide expert advice and information on all aspects of product commercialization to assist applicants with their projects. In addition, the regional centers can help coordinate commercialization and research projects around the country to help prevent duplication and to identify market needs.

The regional director of each regional center, in consultation with an advisory council and other expert project reviewers, shall make recommendations on the applications. The Board of Directors of the Corporation, appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture, shall review the recommendations and shall vote on whether and how to assist the applicants.

After an initial appropriation over several years, AARCC is designed to be self-financing through a revolving fund.

Successful companies are required to repay AARCC for the financial assistance it provides. These repayments, in addition to other contributions from State and private sources, are to be used solely for the continuation of AARCC's activities.

Mr. President, this bill logically links our research activities with our commercialization activities. Senator HARKIN and I are convinced that this linkage will result in a powerful and successful program to move new industrial product ideas from the laboratory to the marketplace.

Legislation which recently passed Congress will complement this bill. Our current farm program discourages farmers from planting alternative crops because by doing so, they reduce the number of acres they can enter into the commodity support programs. This law allows farmers to plant alternative crops on permitted acreage for the 1990 crop-year without losing their base acres for farm program purposes. I want to note the leadership of Senator BOND in establishing flexible planting provisions, and I hope that we will extend this law to future crop-years in the 1990 farm bill.

It is time to take advantage of the benefits that new industrial product commercialization can provide. It is time for the passage of this bill. I urge my colleagues to join Senator HARKIN, myself, and the cosponsors in pushing for its enactment.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1699

SEC. 101. FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.

(a) FINDINGS.—Congress finds that—

(1) with the advances made in biotechnology and other advances in science, there is a far greater capability of modifying plants and plant materials in order to produce commercially viable nonfood products;

(2) the diversification of agriculture is crucial for the long term economic health of that sector and for the economy of rural America;

(3) the use of agricultural and forestry products for nonfood, nonfeed industrial uses can reduce the United States trade deficit and be environmentally beneficial;

(4) a major increase in targeted research in the area described in paragraph (3) is necessary to maximize the number and value of nonfood products;

(5) many of the emerging new ideas, products, and processes resulting from agricultural research will not be commercialized because of high initial financing costs and high risk; and

(6) the careful targeting of financial assistance to entrepreneurs for the commercialization of new industrial uses of agricultural and forestry products will be a cost effective means of stabilizing the agricultural sector and redeveloping the rural economy.

(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this Act through the Corporation established pursuant to section 103—

(1) to authorize research in modification of plants and plant materials, and associated research, in order to develop and produce marketable products other than food, feed or traditional forest or fiber products;

(2) to commercialize new nonfood, nonfeed uses for traditional and new agricultural crops in order to create jobs, to enhance the economic development of the rural economy, and to diversify markets for raw agricultural and forestry products;

(3) to encourage cooperative development and marketing efforts among manufacturers, financiers, universities, and private and government laboratories in order to accelerate the commercialization of new industrial uses for agricultural and forestry products; and

(4) to direct, to the maximum extent possible, commercialization efforts toward the development of new industrial products from crops that can be raised by family-sized agricultural producers.

S.J. Res. 209. Joint resolution to designate November 11, 1989, as "Washington Centennial Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WASHINGTON CENTENNIAL DAY

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a resolution to designate November 11, 1989, "Washington Centennial Day." I am pleased to be joined by my colleague and fellow Washingtonian, Senator SLADE GORTON.

Mr. President, 1989 marks the 100th year of statehood for our home State of Washington. On November 11, 1889, at 3:09 p.m., the first Governor of Washington State, Elisha P. Ferry, received a telegram from President Benjamin Harrison announcing the designation of Washington as the 42d State in the Union. A story in the Tacoma Daily News the following day exemplifies the pride and joy felt by the people of Washington State:

Occupying, as it does, the very richest section of the whole country, with its wealth of inland shores lined with timber enough to supply the world, with its rich veins of valuable ores, with its valuable agricultural lands and its unparalleled scenery for beauty and grandeur, combined with its unequalled climate, it starts out on its life of statehood with not only the eyes of this land, but the whole world upon it.

In addition to the obvious resource wealth of our State, we have been blessed by a population that has always shown a tremendous ability to overcome adversity and lend a hand to fellow Washingtonians in times of need. We have celebrated all of these treasures throughout the centennial year with hundreds of festivals, exhibits and other special events that signify all that is Washington. These activities will remind the residents of Washington and people around the Nation of our resources.

We will also recall the tremendous economic and population growth of the 1700's and 1800's. We often hear the stories of fur traders and goldseekers who came West seeking fame and fortune. First came the rugged travelers, then the brides, and finally, whole families, determined to brave the hardships of a new life. The completion of a railroad with the East in 1883 eventually brought many of the luxuries and innovations of an advancing nation to the Northwest.

Since statehood in 1889, Washington has witnessed tremendous growth. Washington State has become a leader in aviation, shipbuilding, trade, forestry, agriculture, and energy resources. The population has reached over 4.4 million. The Puget Sound area flourishes as a gateway to the Pacific. Eastern Washington consists of rich agricultural land that has made our State famous worldwide for its Washington apples and many other crops.

At the same time we look upon the past with pride, we must recognize we have made a good start and use this momentum to lay the groundwork for future excellence. While Washington's vibrant economy remains a source of pride, we must acknowledge that we have some very real problems. The urban and rural areas of Washington share the same problems felt across the country. In these periods of difficulty, it is fitting that we reflect on our history and culture as we strive toward a better future. While this centennial year should be a time of celebration, it should also be used to rededicate ourselves to the improvement of our State. With the same perseverance Lewis and Clark had as they searched for the Pacific Ocean, we can take this opportunity to find solutions to some of our State's problems.

As our State experiences the dawn of a new century, we look to the past with pride and make a commitment to work to ensure a bright future for our children and our children's children. We remain the trustees of great natural resources, beauty and opportunity and we will do our best to protect these things for the Nation's Evergreen State.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, it is with special pleasure that I join my colleague Senator Adams in introducing and supporting the joint resolution marking the centennial of my home State of Washington. We are honored to share this centennial year with five other Western States: Idaho, Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Wyoming. These six Western States have added greatly to the richness and diversity of our Union.

Washington became the first and only State named after a President on November 11, 1889, when Benjamin Harrison signed a proclamation with a pen made of Washington gold and a holder of Washington laurel. The Western Union telegram announcing this event sent to Gov. Elisha P. Ferry was, appropriately enough, sent collect.

Washington had been inhabited by Native Americans for thousands of years, but was not well known to the rest of the world until 1778 when Captain Cook explored the area and returned with tales of the richness of the land, timber, and fur of the Pacific Northwest. More explorers followed and in 1804 the young United States of America sent out an expedition led by Lewis and Clark to explore the area for the new Nation. Missionaries and pioneers began to flow across the continent to settle in the fertile Oregon territory. Among those first settlers was Marcus Whitman, a missionary whose statue is located here in our Nation's Capitol.

In 1889, Washington had just 350,000 people, well under the current population of present day Seattle. Over the last century the State has grown to nearly 4.5 million people. These residents, like the pioneers before them, were attracted to the State by its soaring forests, rich waters, grand mountains, and mild climate. These hardy inhabitants came from around the globe, with many early settlers hailing from Scandanavia and more recent immigrants coming from Asia and Latin America.

Let us for a moment Mr. President, turn back the clock 100 years, to the events leading to statehood that are commemorated by the resolution.

On July 4, 1889, a constitutional convention convened in Olympia to write a State constitution. The convention finally adjourned at 9:30 p.m. on August 22, 1889, and referred a State constitution to the people for ratification on October 1.

That election would also select the site of the State capital, and decide who would be Governor of Washington if it achieved statehood.

It will hearten my Republican colleagues, at least, to know that on, September 19, 1889, the Democratic candidate for Governor boasted that he would win the October election, and that a Democratic landslide would eradicate the Republicans in the Washington Territory "like a Kansas cyclone." I am just partisan enough to be delighted the Democrats lost, shall we say, "as if buried by a Cascade avalanche."

The October election arrived and the constitution was ratified, Olympia was chosen as the State capital and Republican Governor Elisha Ferry was elected.

Only one thing stood in the way of achieving statehood: the Territorial Governor forgot to certify to President Harrison that the constitution that was sent to Washington, DC, was a true copy of the original. Properly, the President refused to sign it. Amid the ensuing uproar, the Governor dispatched on November 4, the proper certificate by something called fast mail.

I must say, Mr. President, we have not improved much in the last 100 years. The certificate arrived at the White House on November 9, a scant 5 days later. Today, a letter mailed from the State is likely to take at least that long.

Two days later, on November 11, 1889, President Harrison signed the constitution, and Washington was officially proclaimed a State.

Mr. President, in the ensuing 100 years, Washington State has grown to be the second most populous State in the West and a national leader in many areas such as aviation, computer software, forestry, and agricultural products. As we enter our second century of statehood we will strive to live up to the theme of the Washington State Centennial Commission to "Celebrate the heritage of the past, the energy of the present, and the promise of the future."

In lieu of the language proposed to be stricken insert the following:

Congress makes the following findings:

The United States Government relies on satellites for communication, early warning of attack, monitoring compliance with arms control agreements, and many other vital national security functions;

Such satellites constitute vital integral parts of many United States weapons systems, command, control and communications systems, and other military systems;

It is essential to the national security of the United States that United States Government satellites not be vulnerable to antisatellite attacks;

It is in the national security interests of the United States and its allies to deter the development and testing of antisatellite weapons by the Soviet Union;

It is in the national security interests of the United States to undertake a balanced response to Soviet antisatellite capabilities, which includes a measured Asat program;

Key agencies of the Executive Branch are examining options for specific antisatellite arms control measures; Therefore:

The executive branch should conclude its examination of specific antisatellite arms control options and rules of the road for space activities without delay, and include its recommendations and conclusions from this examination in the report to Congress already required by the Conference Report on the Fiscal Year 1989 Dire Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act;

The President shall—with a view toward considering how to improve United States Asat arms control monitoring capabilities—assess the national security implications for the United States of a mutual deployment of cooperative monitoring and verification technologies; the results of such assessment shall be included in the above mentioned report; and

As soon as practicable, the President should take advantage of the forum provided by the ongoing defense and space talks with the Soviet Union to explore—consistent with the conclusions of the above-mentioned report—adequately verifiable limitations on the development, testing, production, and deployment of weapons capable of directly threatening United States military satellites.

WARNER AMENDMENT NO. 88

Mr. McCAIN (for Mr. WARNER) proposes an amendment to the bill H.R. 3072, supra; as follows:

SEC. . FEASIBILITY STUDY OF LAND TRANSFER FOR USE AS A CORRECTIONAL FACILITY.

(a)(1) The Secretary of Defense, in consultation with the United States Attorney General, shall conduct a study of the feasibility of selling or otherwise transferring to the Commonwealth of Virginia, subdivisions thereof, or any combination of subdivisions thereof, a parcel of land approximately 100 acres not more than 100 miles from the southern boundary of Arlington County, from the military installations within Virginia which encompass land that may be suitable for use by the Commonwealth of Virginia, subdivisions thereof, or any combination of subdivisions thereof, as a site for a medium security correctional facility for persons sentenced in the courts of Virginia or in the United States District Court in Virginia.

(c)(1) The Secretary of Defense shall transfer funds appropriated by this Act for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1990, as provided in paragraphs (2) and (3). ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

AMERICANS WITH DISABILITIES ACT

● Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I am most pleased that the Senate recently passed the Americans With Disabilities Act. In my judgment, this is truly landmark legislation, and I wish to commend my colleague, Senator HARKIN, chairman of the Subcommittee on the Handicapped, for his pivotal role in developing this comprehensive bill.

At this time, I would specifically like to address title I, section 101(5), on the prohibition of discrimination against individuals because of a relationship to, or association with, an individual with a disability. There is one group of people who continually face discrimination because of their relationship with people who have contracted the HIV virus or AIDS—they are our Nation's health care workers. Perhaps no group knows or understands the devastation of AIDS better than those who provide health care to the AIDS patients. Nurses provide continuous care for AIDS patients, from the initial stages of hospitalization, to home care, to the hospice stage of this fatal disease.

The AIDS epidemic has produced fear—both nationally and internationally. The fear has generated emotional and sometimes irrational responses by the public. In March 1987, the Supreme Court ruled that a person with a currently contagious disease may be considered "handicapped" under section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973. In other words, contagious diseases are covered by Federal laws which prohibit discrimination against disabled persons. Dr. Louis Sullivan, Secretary of Health and Human Services, has stated, "Discrimination against those infected with HIV virus is unacceptable. Fear and ignorance must be overcome, not accommodated." This discrimination also extends to persons who associate with disabled individuals—whether they be a family member, a partner, a teacher, or a health care worker. Registered nurses have been in the forefront of providing quality care to AIDS patients. Yet, nurses' access to training, services, and even insurance, have been denied because they are the caregivers of AIDS patients. It is critical that we maintain our commitment to nurses by ensuring they are not discriminated against because they provide the essential and needed care for AIDS patients.●

JAMES W. SEWALL CO.

● Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I would like to call my colleagues' attention to an article in a recent edition of the Bangor Daily News on the James W. Sewall Co., one of my State's most innovative and successful businesses.

This family-run corporation is respected as one of the Nation's foremost land surveying companies. Beginning in the 1950's, the reins of the company have passed through four generations of Sewalls, and, in the process, the business has grown from a local service to a major company with 110 employees and clients all over the country.

In order to produce maps portraying everything from tree diseases to land uses to electrical power grids, the Sewall Co. makes use of sophisticated aerial photography and satellite imagery. Its archives have grown to include more than 500,000 photographs, mostly of areas in New England and New York, and over 600 communities have used the company's expertise to create their tax maps.

The chairman of the company is Joe Sewall, a former four-term president of the Maine senate and a close friend of mine. It was Joe's experience as a World War II navigator that exposed him to the new technologies that came to fundamentally alter the surveying business.

Coordinating the company's day-to-day operations is Joe's son, David, who is carrying on the family tradition of growth and sound management.

The James W. Sewall Co. represents a fine example of a Maine business that is not resting on its laurels. I think many of you will find the following article of interest:

[From the Bangor (ME) Daily News]

IN THE SPOTLIGHT: JAMES W. SEWALL CO.—AERIAL PHOTOGRAPHY REVOLUTIONIZED SURVEYING COMPANY

(BY ANDREW KEKACS)

OLD TOWN.—Let's imagine that you just won the Tri-State Megabucks and are now the proud owner of $6 million.

Being both incredibly lucky and reasonably shrewd, you decide that Maine real estate is a good place to sock away some of that cash.

You buy a 10,000-acre parcel somewhere east of Lincoln. Now you need a company to produce an aerial survey of the place; prepare an inventory and map of its tree species, wetlands and other natural resources; engineer the wood roads that lead into your lakeside retreat; and design water and septic systems at the lodge to handle up to 250 guests.

To generate a little good will with the neighbors, you also ask the company to put together a new set of tax maps for the nearest town.

It's likely that the James W. Sewall Co. of Old Town is the only firm in the nation that can meet all of those needs without hiring people from outside the company.

The business traces it roots to the late 1850s. James W. Sewall Sr., a civil engineer who was born in Old Town, was supervising the construction of a sewer system in Tennessee. But he contracted malaria—then an incurable disease—and was advised by a doctor to get plenty of fresh air.

Sewall knew that Maine offered more fresh air than any other place in the East. He returned to the city of his birth and set up shop as a surveyor and forester.

He and his son, James Jr., provided a number of services for landowners. They surveyed parcels of land and prepared inventories to the size, type, age and quality of trees on them. Information collected in the field was used to create maps that helped owners decide how to cut their land.

The company also designed dams that provided water to float the trees to the mill. When trucks began to be used in the woods, the Sewall Co. engineered the roads.

Such field-based work kept the company busy for most of a century. Technology pioneered during World War II, however, played a major role in changing the way the Sewall Co. gathered information.

That technology was aerial photography, and Joseph Sewall had a chance to see its potential first-hand. The son of James Sewall Jr., he flew as a navigator during the war.

After V-J Day, Joseph Sewall brought the idea home to Old Town. The company began to experiment with it, while the younger Sewall made plans to earn a graduate degree in forestry.

Those plans were ended when his father died in 1946. Joseph Sewall took over the company and began to build an in-house capability for aerial photography.

"It revolutionized our business," said his 34-year-old son, David Sewall, who is executive vice president of the company. "It literally brought the field into the office."

David Sewall coordinates day-to-day operations of the company and, with his father, determines overall corporate policy. Joseph Sewall, 67, is the chairman. The two are sole owners of the company, which has about 110 employees.

Rapid changes in technology and the elder Sewall's involvement in politics—he was a four-term president of the Maine Senate—led to the development of an uncommon management structure at the firm.

"This is a uniquely cooperative effort," said David Sewall. "My father was away at the Legislature for almost 16 years . . . the departments have operated with a lot of autonomy."

Six managers oversee the unusual mix of services provided by the company. The group includes: Earl Raymond, senior vice president for surveying and mapping; William Ryan, vice president for engineering: Leroy Klitch, vice president for air surveys and chief pilot; David Edson, vice president for forestry and natural resources; Gerald Thurlow, vice president for municipal mapping; and Mark Jadkowski, assistant vice president for digital data base development.

"Information gathering is the basis of the business," said the younger Sewall. "Data from aerial photography (and other sources) is transformed into usable information in two main areas: mapping and civil engineering."

When the Sewall Co. performed its first aerial survey, most of its equipment was surplus military gear. Today, a good camera system can cost as much as $300,000.

The company's first aerial survey was completed in 1947. Since then, its archives have grown to include more than 500,000 photographs. Most of the surveys have been done in New England and New York, but the company has worked all over the world.

Using the photographs and other information, the company creates maps that portray everything from spruce budworm damage to land uses and electrical power grids. More than 600 communities have used the Sewall Co. to create their tax maps.

The overflights are also used by the civil engineering side of the business. They provide information that can help to site oil and gas lines, highways, power lines and other major projects.

The civil engineering department has worked on projects as varied as an assessment of potential salmon aquaculture sites, the design of a waste-water treatment plant for Dover-Foxcroft and the creation of a 68-acre industrial park in East Millinocket.

The integration of new technology has helped the Sewall Co. to survive and prosper as an information company in the Information Age. Much of the raw data it collects is now stored on computers; finished products are also produced electronically. Satellite imagery is becoming an important source of data for the firm.

Sewall sees no end to society's hunger for information.

"The government already has detailed mapping of the moon, and there will be satellite mapping of Venus soon," he said. "The government is soon to be overwhelmed with information, and it may need private contractors to help deal with it . . . In 20 or 30 years, I foresee us doing work (relating to) other planets."

Timing is critical in deciding when to make use of new technology or pursue new business opportunities, according to Sewall.

"It's instinctive," he said. "We've made some correct guesses, and some incorrect guesses. So far, the correct guesses have run slightly ahead."●

DR. GEORGY BELITSKY A REFUSENIK IN LITHUANIA

● Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I rise today to call the attention of my colleagues, and to respectfully request their assistance in making the voice of the United States Senate heard on behalf of Dr. Georgy Belitsky, a refusenik in Lithuania.

All of us have watched as General Secretary Gorbachev has traveled the world to deliver his message of change in the Soviet Union. We have watched and listened as he talks of perestroika and glasnost. We have applauded the first, tentative moves he has made in withdrawing arms from Eastern Europe, and we take heart in the steady stream of pronouncements from the Kremlin that indeed, the winds of change are blowing in the Soviet Union.

In the face of all of the public acclaim, and the new image of the Soviet Union as the vanguard of progressive forces, it is important for us to recognize that there still remain many pieces of unfinished business on the Soviet agenda for reform. Foremost among these are those issues relating to human rights and the right of individuals to emigrate from the Soviet Union in an orderly and expeditious manner.

The case of Dr. Belitsky is exemplary of many in the Soviet Union, where humanitarian deeds have yet to fully match humanitarian rhetoric.

As with many refuseniks, Dr. Belitsky's application for a visa has been refused on the grounds that his employer, the Ministry of Public Education, had objected on the grounds of secrecy.

Dr. Belitsky had worked in the Institute of Mechanics until 1979, developing measuring instruments. When developing these instruments, he had contact with many enterprises through which he obtained parts and details and tested measuring tools. A few of these contacts were military and entrance to them required a clearance form and passport certification. Georgy applied for the lowest form which allowed him to enter military areas, but not access to any secret documents. With such forms, one is not allowed to leave the country for 5 years after their return. Georgy returned his forms in 1979, and all of his projects had the official stamp "nonsecret," but his refusal was extended until 2010. He has not been permitted to work in his area of qualification since he applied to emigrate and now is employed as a bookbinder.

In March 1989, Dr. Belitsky was informed that his secrecy limitation was being removed and thus there was no objection to his emigration. Then suddenly, the Ministry of Defense objected and Dr. Belitsky has had his secrecy limitation extended until the year 2010, when he will be 75 years old.

It is my belief that Dr. Belitsky's activities as an activist in support of human rights in the Soviet Union are the real reason that Soviet officials have refused him permission to emigrate to Israel and allow him to join his family in Haifa.

Recently I have drafted a letter to Secretary Gorbachev, calling his attention to this situation, and asking him to take positive action on behalf of Dr. Belitsky. I ask that this letter be included into the RECORD and I urge you to join me in signing this letter, and letting your voice be heard on behalf of human rights in the Soviet Union.

The letter follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, September 11, 1989.

General Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev,
Secretariate of the CPSU Central Committee, Moscow 103132, Staraya Ploshchad '4, U.S.S.R.

DEAR SECRETARY GORBACHEV: Your leadership has significantly contributed to developments in the Soviet Union which foster a climate of optimism among Americans concerning the future of U.S.-Soviet relations. The terms Glasnost and Perestroika have found their way into the hearts and minds of the American people and signal positive change in the Soviet Union.

Freedom of emigration should be a cornerstone of these policies and it is in light of this that we would like to inform you of a tragic situation regarding Georgy Belitsky's application for a visa.

Dr. Belitsky first applied for a visa in 1979 and was refused on the grounds of secrecy. Yet he has had no contact with secret documents since 1978. In May of 1989 he received a notice that his secrecy restriction was being lifted, but as of this date, he has not yet been granted a visa.

It appears that his activities as an activist in the Jewish emigration movement may be influencing the decision to allow him to join his wife and family in Israel. In the spirit of the changes taking place within the Soviet Union under your leadership, he should be allowed to emigrate.

We urge you to become involved in this case and expedite granting of his visa.

Sincerely,

J. JAMES EXON,
U.S. Senator.●

THE DONATED DENTAL SERVICES PROGRAM

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, every American should have access to the best possible health care. Yet as we all know, we are still far from achieving this goal. We need to encourage and support innovative means of filling the gaps in our health care system.

I am proud that in New Jersey, health care professionals have formed a partnership that is providing badly needed dental care to some of the most vulnerable members of society. The Donated Dental Services [DDS] Program is jointly sponsored by the New Jersey Dental Association, the National Foundation of Dentistry for the Handicapped, the New Jersey Foundation of Dentistry for the Handicapped, and the New Jersey Dental Laboratory Association. These organizations work together to provide comprehensive dental care for people who would otherwise go without. Individuals donate their lives and skills, and private companies help to support their efforts. This partnership of corporations and individuals will be able to improve the health and the quality of life for thousands of New Jerseyites.

The program is designed to help those who would otherwise fall through the cracks of our health care system—the special cases who might qualify for government assistance, but who could not afford badly needed dental care without some assistance.

The program is now operating in several States. These health professionals embody the highest ideals of their profession. They deserve our encouragement and our support.●

REFORM OF THE TORT SYSTEM

● Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, earlier this year the American College of Trial Lawyers published a report outlining its recommendations for legislation to reform the tort system. Many of this country's finest lawyers, including former Attorney General Griffin Bell and former Solicitor General Erwin Griswold, wrote this report. They believe that litigants often are not treated fairly by the tort system.

The report focuses on the awarding of punitive damages. The purpose of awarding punitive damages is not to compensate injured victims. It is to punish wrongdoers. However, the principal goal of the tort system should be to compensate victims—to make them whole. The report concludes that awarding excessive punitive damages on one plaintiff may deny others compensation. Subsequent plaintiffs with claims against a defendant who has paid this excessive judgment may not be compensated for their economic damages if the defendant exhausted his resources by paying the initial claim. Other victims would be out of luck; the principal goal of the tort system would be thwarted.

The report recommends limiting the awarding of punitive damages to those circumstances when a defendant should be punished. The authors believe that punitive damages should not exceed $250,000 or twice the amount of compensatory damages, whichever is greater. They would require a plaintiff to prove that a defendant acted with a wanton, willful, or malicious intent to harm by clear and convincing evidence. They suggest that a defendant be allowed to call for a bifurcated trial so that a plaintiff could not introduce evidence admissible only for assessing punitive damages during the compensatory damages phase of the trial. Finally, they recommend that plaintiffs not be permitted to include a specific monetary amount in their pleading for punitive damages.

The inequities of the tort system are so pronounced that Federal reform legislation is essential, according to the report. If left to the States, the authors conclude, reform could be slow and incomplete. They say that congressional action would solve the problem quickly and completely.

Mr. President, Senators KASTEN, INOUYE, ROCKEFELLER, and I have introduced S. 1400, the Product Liability Reform Act. This bill incorporates many of the College of Trial Lawyers' recommendations with respect to product liability law. S. 1400 is essential because the current product liability system is wasteful and often fails to deliver just compensation to injured victims. It can be likened to a lottery. For example, slightly injured victims fare well. They receive almost nine times their losses on average while the most seriously injured receive only 15 percent of their losses. While some victims may hit the jackpot and win this lottery, most cannot afford to gamble. In addition, victims generally must wait years to be compensated. The average product liability case takes 3 years to complete. Most victims cannot afford this delay.

Now is the time to reform the tort system. S. 1400 will address these problems. The bill encourages litigants to resolve their disputes out of court. And, it will assure that a "deep pocket" cannot be raided for noneconomic damages, except to the extent it is at fault. The bill also creates a more equitable system for awarding punitive damages, incorporating many of the recommendations in the American College of Trial Lawyers' report.

Mr. President, I commend the College of Trial Lawyers for this report. Their analysis of the inequities of the tort system is thorough, and their recommendations, if enacted, will make the system fairer. The distinguished authors of this report recognize that the system must be reformed in order to serve the interests of justice better. I hope their good work will enlighten those members of the trial bar who continue to resist all efforts to reform the tort system. I urge my colleagues to support S. 1400.●

ANNIVERSARY OF BATTLE OF KOSOVO

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, on Saturday, September 30, Serbian Americans from across this Nation and Canada will gather in Dearborn, MI, to commemorate the 600th anniversary of the Battle of Kosovo.

In that battle, the Serbians were defeated by the forces of the Ottoman Empire after a tremendous struggle that saw the death of the Serbian leader Prince Lazar. Four centuries passed before the Serbians avenged the death of Lazar and the Turkish rulers were evicted in the Second Battle of Kosovo.

This year's Kosovo celebration is being held in St. Lazarus Serbian Orthodox Church, the only church on this continent to be named for the martyr Lazar.

The combination of faith and nation that carried the Serbians into battle continues to live in the hearts of these warriors' descendants. For them and for all of us, Kosovo remains a symbol of perseverance. On this anniversary, I congratulate those who gather to honor the memory of this battle and this ultimate victory.●

HAZEL MINNEFIELD

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, "A most admirable person is one who reaches down to help someone rather than reaching up to boost someone in hopes of raising herself." Certainly, this applies to Hazel Minnefield. Hazel has spent her entire life in the manifestation of helping others. The daughter of a small town doctor, who often took money out of his pocket and slipped it under the pillow of his patient, was raised in a giving atmosphere.

In her early years, Hazel took a great interest in teenage girls—her organization presented debutantes and cotillions. She was a "second mother" to 12-18 girls annually, for over 5 years.

Hazel has been an active volunteer with the Red Cross, the Salvation Army, various nursing homes, and the NAACP Youth Groups Red Cross. She served as a screening clerk for the Salvation Army, a guardian for elderly church members, director of the Madison County Food Bank, and currently serves as the national vice-chairman of the Women NAACP.

Included in the many awards received by Hazel are Outstanding Black Women in Indiana History, Twentieth Century Honor Roll of Fame National NAACP, Outstanding Achievement—Red Cross, and One of Twenty Outstanding Black Women in the Country.

I ask my colleagues to join me in honoring one of Indiana's great citizens.●

CALL TO CONSCIENCE STATEMENT

● Mr. KOHL. Mr. President, today I would like to join a number of my colleagues in commending Senators ALAN DIXON and BILL ARMSTRONG and the Union of Councils for Soviet Jews for the tremendous work they have done on this year's Call to Conscience Vigil. We all must remember that despite the tremendous changes in the Soviet Union brought about by glasnost, there are still people in that country who are subject to persecution.

We have recently seen a remarkable improvement in the number of Soviet Jews allowed to emigrate from the Soviet Union. Only 8,155 Jews left in 1987. In 1988, that number rose to 19,286, and this year it will probably reach over 50,000. It seems that, finally, the doors of emigration are opening for many Soviet Jews. This trend is encouraging but, it ought not blind us to continuing problems. There are alarming reports of growing anti-Semitism in Soviet society. And there are too many confirmed cases of Soviet Jews being denied the right to emigrate. The reasons given by Soviet authorities for their denial range from knowledge of State secrets to the inability of the individual's family to support themselves if that person were to leave. I would like to take this opportunity to highlight the plight of one such Soviet Jew, Boris Kelman.

Mr. Kelman, his wife and his two sons have been in refusal since 1979 for reasons of state secrecy. Although Boris left his job in 1978, the Soviets once again refused to issue the Kelman family Israeli visas on July 13, 1989. This time, they can't even apply again until 1995. Boris is, in his own words, "at the end of my rope."

President Gorbachev has stated that no one should be refused permission to emigrate on grounds of secrecy for longer than 7 years. By 1995, Boris and his family will have been denied visas for 16 years; that's over three times the limit that the Soviets say will be incorporated into their new emigration laws.

Just recently, the Union of Councils held "Kelman Rescue Week," during which they invited activists and other concerned parties in this country to publicize Boris' plight and to put pressure on the Soviet Government. I want to continue to emphasize the injustice of his refusal, and I urge President Gorbachev to allow Boris Kelman and others like him to exercise their basic human right to emigrate.●

THANKS TO OUR STAFF

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, Tuesday night the Senate approved the foreign operations appropriations bill for fiscal year 1990. I just want to let my colleagues know that getting this bill approved in the Senate would have been impossible without the assistance of a number of Senate staff.

On the minority side, Jim Bond was an immense help, drawing on his years of experience on the Appropriations Committee to help craft a bipartisan bill supported by Senator KASTEN and me. His assistant, Juanita Rilling, worked tirelessly to help prepare the bill.

On the majority side, Fred Kenney, an indefatigable Vermonter, worked days, nights, and weekends as our subcommittee clerk making sure that this bill was ready for committee and floor action. This is Fred's first of what I hope will be many years on the subcommittee.

Rand Fishbein has also done an excellent job as a professional subcommittee staff person. His institutional memory and wide-ranging expertise were very important.

Tim Rieser, a Vermont native, has worked with me for a number of years. Tim has spent much of the last 9 months working, writing, and listening in preparing for putting this bill together. I value Tim's quiet but insightful advice, and feel fortunate to have him on our subcommittee staff. He is indispensible.

Finally, I want to thank the staff director of the Foreign Operations Committee, Eric Newsom. Eric has been a trusted adviser and close friend for 7 years. He brings a brilliant mind and a cool professionalism to his job. He is a public servant in the truest meaning of the words, and I owe him my gratitude for his selfless efforts.

Naturally I am indebted to my colleague and friend, BOB KASTEN for his patience, expertise, and cooperation were essential, and I applaud him.●

RETIREMENT OF JOHN F. DATENA

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, after 16 years as State forester and 39 years of service to the State of Indiana, John F. Datena is retiring with the assured confidence that forest conservation and the proper management of Indiana's forestlands is alive and well and interest by both landowners and industry is growing.

John was born in New York State and moved to Elkhart, IN, with his family where he attended high school. He attended Purdue University in 1944, but World War II delayed his completion of a bachelors degree in forest production until January 1950. Upon graduation he went to work for the Indiana Department of Conservation, Division of Forestry, as a property manager of Owen-Putnam State Forest. His first duties were to purchase land for the newly developing State forest and to see that old pastures and crop fields were reforested. Subsequently, John moved to Linton as district farm forester where he was responsible for working with private forestland owners, management of all State forest land within this district and supervising fire suppression efforts.

During that period—early 1950's—the division had a fire warden system and it was the district forester's job to hire, train, equip, and supervise the fire wardens and their crews. Back in those days, foresters didn't have as many programs as today, but they still remained fully occupied. John always says: "Those were the days when men were men and foresters were supermen."

In 1953 John became Indiana's first watershed forester and worked in Pike County on Flat Creek Watershed which was Indiana's pilot Public Law 566 small watershed project. In 1957, John again became a district forester. His duty station was located just west of Jasonville on the corner of Shakamak State Park in a new building created to house the coal lands forester, the post commander for enforcement, and the district forester. John stayed at Jasonville as district forester until he was promoted to CFM supervisor in 1969 and moved to the central office in Indianapolis where he gave on-the-job training to 47 young foresters many of whom have become property managers, district foresters, and teachers—at least one is a university professor. In 1973 he was appointed as State forester and has spent the past 16 years in that capacity.

John should be proud of his many accomplishments. Due to his persistence, the Indiana Forestry and Woodland Owners Association, Inc., was founded in 1977. In 1979, Gov. Otis Bowen made him a Sagamore of the Wabash. He served as Indiana's director of the Young Adult Conservation Corps—a Federal program—from 1977 through 1980 when the program ended. In 1981, he served as chairman of the Northeastern Area State Foresters' Association. He was chairman of the first Governor's Conference on Indiana's Forestry and the Wood-Using Industries which was held in Indianapolis in September 1984. The ultimate result of this conference was the formation of the Indiana Forest Industry Council, Inc., which is made up of loggers, timber buyers, and sawmill owners and is dedicated to growing high quality hardwood forests through self-improvement and the promotion of proper forest management with private forestland owners.

Through the State forestry planning committee, which he has chaired since becoming State forester, and through his many contacts with Indiana's forest industries, John encouraged the idea of an Indiana Wood Expo. This idea became reality in February 1989 when the first Indiana Wood Expo entertained over 10,000 people during a 2-day run at the Indianapolis Downtown Convention Center. Plans are already underway for next year's Wood Expo in April 1990.

In July of this year, John was named "Forest Conservationist of 1989" by the Indiana Wildlife Federation.

John is an active member of the Indiana Society of American Foresters. He owns a farm in eastern Greene County where he manages 100 acres of hardwood forestland and raises Christmas trees. Now that John is retiring, he plans to spend more time tending his farm and just doing the things he wants.●

EL SALVADOR PEACE

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, last week the issue of El Salvador came to the forefront of our proceedings in the Senate. We had a healthy, and much-needed debate about the situation in that strife-torn country and what our strategy should be in promoting a negotiated, political solution to that civil war.

Against the background of this debate was the recent agreement between the Government of El Salvador and the rebels which has institutionalized the negotiation process. Therefore, the debate was not over the goal of our policy—that if a negotiated, political solution to the conflict—but over what signals should be sent which would assist the Salvadorans in achieving that goal.

The choices we voted upon last week were difficult choices. They were not easy for many of us. This dilemma is perhaps best epitomized by the decisions made by two of our Democratic colleagues representing the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Each took a different path in the hope that it would accomplish the same goal. The dilemma each faced, and the reasons which led our colleagues to part company on two votes, but not on the principle, is captured perfectly in an op-ed piece written by Thomas Oliphant for the September 24, 1989, edition of the Boston Globe.

I ask that the piece be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Boston Sunday Globe, Sept. 24, 1989]

KERRY TAKES A LONELY ROAD FOR SALVADOR PEACE

(By Thomas Oliphant)

WASHINGTON.—Two roads diverged on the Senate floor Thursday night.

They represent different avenues for the American role in war-ruined El Salvador at a time when the grounds for hope that a negotiated peace is possible are real, but tempered as always by the lessons of a decade of horror and failure.

What spiced the debate over which road to take is that one course was ardently advocated by liberal Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, and the other just as ardently advocated by another liberal, Sen. John F. Kerry.

For now, the Kerry-supported position has prevailed—continued aid to the Salvador government on what Kerry called the "gamble" that it will help produce a settlement soon. A coalition of Bush administration-supporting Repubicans and Democrats, encouraged by recent peace-negotiation progress, prevailed 2 to 1 in the key votes.

The Kennedy-supported position—that only clear restrictions on the aid, requiring measurable progress in curbing human rights abuses and staying on the negotiations track, will keep the right-wing Salvadoran military in check—remains, however, as a warning that the United States is going down a risky road. Putting tough strings on US aid was the position that came out of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, but it was set aside on the floor.

"I am taking a position that would clearly be different and even somewhat surprising to some of those who might have anticipated my vote on this matter." Kerry said correctly.

His argument was based on an observation that the recently lifted hopes for a settlement—a negotiating breakthrough by the government and its leftist enemies in Mexico City—"were based on the status quo, hopes that are based on the current [US] aid, on the current unattached aid, and on the current acceptance of the political realities of the situation in El Salvador."

One of those realities is the new right-wing president. Alfredo Cristiani. He appears to represent more the economic than the military right, interested more in economic development than killing communists. He governs, however, in the midst of military figures with direct links to the nun-murdering savages of the recent past.

To date, he has been a responsible participant in Central American diplomacy, and there is no denying the risks (including personal risks) he has taken in helping to institutionalize the negotiating process. (The next meeting is already scheduled for Costa Rica in October, and each side is pledged not to walk out.)

Accordingly, Kerry argued that it is important "to encourage and support this process rather than creating potential obstacles to the achievement of a goal that all of us share."

Kerry's hopes, based simply on the Mexico City breakthrough, are real. Additionally, those of us not born yesterday should assume that there are negotiating back-channels involving the government and guerrilla armed forces that for now are supporting the public process.

"Believe me, if I am wrong I will return to the floor of the Senate to cut off aid completely to that country, and I know I will be joined by others," Kerry said.

After a generation spent opposing unjust wars, Kennedy had a liberal veteran's experience with the political impracticability of cutting off aid to repressive regimes in the face of certain presidential vetoes. That is one source of his support for putting clear strings on the new aid for El Salvador.

"I understand the desire of many of my colleagues to demonstrate support for President Cristiani as he enters into peace negotiations," Kennedy said. "We all support him in that effort."

"But President Cristiani is not the problem—the Salvadoran military is. Increased military aid at this time sends the wrong signal to those we most need to influence in these negotiations—the Salvadoran armed forces. Unless we keep the pressure on the military to respect human rights and support these negotiations, they will never succeed. . . . Strong US pressure to keep them on track can be a vital element in ensuring they do."

Now, it won't be. When the two roads diverged on the Senate floor, Kerry took the one least traveled by liberals in the hope, but not the knowledge, that it will make all the difference.●

CONGRATULATIONS TO RICHARD D. MORGAN ON THE OCCASION OF HIS RETIREMENT FROM THE FEDERAL HIGHWAY ADMINISTRATION

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I would draw my colleagues' attention to the September 22, 1989, retirement of a fine civil servant, a man who has spent much of his life in the service of the United States, Richard D. Morgan. For the past 32 years of service in the Federal Highway Administration [FHWA], Dick has exhibited outstanding leadership and excellence. He has established a reputation throughout the Department of Transportation and the highway transportation community as an effective, innovative manager, dedicated to the mission of the Federal Highway Administration. Dick has been the Executive Director and top career official in the FHWA since 1982.

Richard Morgan graduated with honors from Michigan State University and the Franklin Law School. He began his career with the FHWA in 1957 as a trainee and moved up the organizational ranks through positions of successively higher responsibility within the FHWA. Throughout his career, he has played a key role in shaping the Federal-Aid Highway Program.

One of Dick's key accomplishments was the improvement of design/construction standards in Federal aid programs. He has enthusiastically promoted a back-to-basics approach to State highway officials, Governors, State legislators, and industry representatives. Under his direction, application of new technology and management improvements combined to yield impressive advancements in a number of areas.

Over the years, Dick has been personally involved in development of highway legislation. He has effectively worked with congressional staff and with the highway community to explore alternatives allowing States maximum flexibility in the management of various highway programs. These alternatives have provided pragmatic approaches for meeting the Nation's highway transportation needs. Recently he has been instrumental in the development of major highway legislation to carry the FHWA through the second half of the 1980's.

Throughout his tenure as executive director, Dick emphasized cost savings, safety, efficiency, and effective management of highway programs. Largely through his personal efforts, these activities have been successfully integrated into the management process throughout the FHWA.

Dick Morgan's achievements and exceptional managerial ability have been recognized over the years. A recipient of the Secretary's Award for Superior Achievement, he also has received outstanding performance ratings every year since 1979 and numerous other awards.

I commend Dick for his dedicated service to America's transportation system. His commitment and devotion were important in the building and maintaining of the infrastructure system, so vital to a free market society. It will be difficult to replace his professionalism and work ethic.

Dick, congratulations on your retirement.●

CONGRATULATIONS, STEPHANIE DENISE SMITH

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, the Young Men's Christian Association of Michigan, Inc., recently held its 12th annual Outstanding Minority Student Program which brings recognition to deserving students in northeast Indiana. Charles Martin, Sr., the director of the YMCA's Urban Youth Services, initiated a citywide search to locate the top minority student in South Bend, IN. The overall achiever, based on grades, SAT scores, and criteria, is Stephanie Denise Smith. Stephanie graduated magna cum laude from South Bend LaSalle High School where she was a National Honor Society member, Dr. Benjamin E. May awardee, YMCA Academic Gold awardee, Martin Luther King, Jr., academic grant recipient, and the National Association of University Women academic scholarship winner. She is a leader and will represent the State of Indiana in good fashion as she enters Johns Hopkins University this fall to study engineering. I ask my colleagues to join me in saluting a fine Hoosier student.●

RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATIONS SUPPORT RELIGIOUS LIBERTY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I am pleased to report to the Senate that a dozen religious organizations held a press conference this afternoon to voice their support for the Nation's Capital Religious Liberty and Academic Freedom Act. The Senate attached the Religious Liberty Act to the District of Columbia Appropriations Act on September 14 of this year.

This year's version of the Religious Liberty Act amends the D.C. Code so that religiously affiliated schools will be able to decide for themselves—as their own religious tenets direct—whether they will extend recognition or benfits to homosexual individuals or groups. The Religous Liberty Act is a simple reaffirmation of religious liberty, and both the Senate (July 11, 1988; September 14, 1989) and the House of Representatives (September 30, 1988) have already agreed that religious schools in the District of Columbia need the protections of the act.

Last year's version of the act required the D.C. Council to amend the District's laws. This year's version uses Congress's exclusive legislative power over the seat of government to make the change directly. When this year's version of the Religious Liberty Act is enacted, the D.C. Code will be amended; this year's version does not require the Congress of the United States to wait on the local city council or the Federal courts.

The following organizations support the Religious Liberty Act and participated in this afternoon's press conference:

National Association of Evangelicals;

Public Affairs Committee of the Southern Baptist Convention;

Luthern Church-Missouri Synod;

Christian College Coalition;

Association of Christian Schools International;

American Association of Christian Schools;

The Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights;

Christian Legal Society;

Presbyterian Lay Committee;

The National Committee of Catholic Laymen;

The Forum for Scriptural Christianity within the United Methodist Church—known as the Good News movement;

Center for Catholic Policy; and Christian Legal Defense & Educational Foundation, Inc.

It is gratifying, of course, to see this kind of support for the Religious Liberty Act. On the other hand, I must say that I am troubled for my country when religious groups must hold press conferences in their pursuit of elementary religious liberty. I had thought and hoped that the United States had reached a point in its history where a religious school could decide for itself—without government decree—that is either would or would not extend recognition, benefits, or privileges to homosexual students or homosexual groups.

The religious groups at today's press conference made eloquent presentations on behalf of religious liberty. I ask that their statements be included in the RECORD and hope that they will be studied by Members and other who cherish our religious liberties.

The statements follow:

STATEMENT OF ROBERT P. DUGAN, JR., DIRECTOR, OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS

The National Association of Evangelicals has called this press conference to announce, along with other organizations concerned for religious liberty, our combined support for the Religious Liberty and Academic Freedom Amendment. This would directly amend the District of Columbia code to free religious schools from the existing mandate of support gay rights organizations on the school campus. Introduced by Sen. William Armstrong, adopted by the Senate on September 14 as an amendment to the D.C. Appropriations bill, it has passed the Senate and awaits action in House-Senate conference.

Let me say at the outset that this is not a homosexual issue—it's a religious liberty issue. As the Rocky Moutain News put it, "Can the government force a religious organization to subsidize practices contrary to its fundamental beliefs"? Should Hebrew Union College be forced to subsidize a Campus Crusade for Christ group? That would be as absurd as forcing Howard University to subsidize a campus chapter of the Ku Klux Klan.

Last year a similar amendment by Senator Armstrong passed Congress. It required the D.C. City Council to change the law or face losing its congressional appropriation. Instead, the Council went to court, contending on First Amendment grounds that Congress couldn't force the Council to enact legislation as a condition of an appropriation. The District Court for the District of Columbia upheld the Council's view, and was affirmed on appeal.

This time around Senator Armstrong's amendment has exactly the same operative language as before, but directly amends D.C. law. Congress clearly has that right under its consitutional power to legislate for the District of Columbia.

It is one thing for student organizations to insist on toleration from those who disagree with their beliefs; it is quite another to demand a subsidy to spread them. Over 200 years ago, Thomas Jefferson wrote that "to compel a man to furnish contributions of money for the propagation of opinions which he disbelieves and abhors, is sinful and tyrannical." If Jefferson was right, Congress must restore to religious educational institutions in the District of Columbia the ultimate civil right—free exercise of religion.

STATEMENT OF DR. NORRIS W. SYDNOR, JR., PUBLIC AFFAIRS COMMITTEE OF THE SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION

My name is Norris Sydnor. I am here today to speak on behalf of the Public Affairs Committee of the Southern Baptist Convention concerning Senator William Armstrong's Amendment to the District of Columbia Appropriations Bill. As a member of the Committee I speak at the request of the Chairman, the Honorable Albert Lee Smith, former Congressman from the State of Alabama.

First, let me say, the Committee supports this amendment. The issue which the Armstrong Amendment addresses is religious liberty. As pastor of the Riverside Baptist Church and president of the Riverside Baptist College and Seminary, we have a fear that the present situation in Washington, D.C. (including a recent court decision) would not allow us the protection to practice the freedom of religious expression which is our guarantee under the First Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. This would indeed hinder the operation of our educational institution.

The absence of the Armstrong Amendment is truly a violation of our civil rights. The issue is not homosexuality, but separation of church and state. We are concerned that a government institution, in this case the District of Columbia, has a right to force a religious institution, in this case Georgetown University, a Roman Catholic Jesuit institution, to subsidize the propagation and promulgation of beliefs diametrically opposed to its religious convictions.

Homosexuals are not forbidden to attend Georgetown University or participate in University life. The question is whether Georgetown University as a religious institution must subsidize a group which promotes beliefs totally contrary to the religious convictions of the institution's founders and supporters.

To allow the District of Columbia or any government body to coerce people to support, financially and otherwise, ideas that violate their conscience is mere oppression, not freedom of conscience; it is religious discrimination, not religious liberty.

We are adamant in our opposition to such coerced support in the form of tax-supported official state churches, just as our forbearers were. As Baptist we would betray the sacred heritage of liberty bequeathed to us by our Baptist forebearers if we did not object in the strongest terms to this egregious court decision and the extremely dangerous precedent it represents. Further, we would be false to our religious and political heritage if we did not avidly support the Armstrong Amendment's reaffirmation of religious freedom in our nation's capital.

The Armstrong Amendment is nothing more, and nothing less, than a defense of, and insistence upon, the protection from government coercion guaranteed by the First Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

THE SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION

Apart from Roman Catholicism, the Southern Baptist Convention is the nation's largest religious demonation, with approximately fifteen million members. There are over 37,000 Southern Baptist churches in the 50 states and the District of Columbia.

The Southern Baptist Convention operates six theological seminaries, with well over 11,000 students and its affiliated state conventions operate more than 50 colleges and universities nationwide. Its cooperating churches operate hundreds of Christian primary and secondary schools.

STATEMENT BY ROBERT G. MORRISON, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, OFFICE OF GOVERNMENT INFORMATION, THE LUTHERAN CHURCH—MISSOURI SYNOD

Once again, we are privileged to lend our support to the efforts of Senator William Armstrong of Colorado in his principled attempt to secure religious liberty for Christian educational institutions and for all Americans. The actions of the District of Columbia government in requiring a major university to recognize and fund homosexual advocacy organizations stands in sharp contrast to our nation's best traditions of tolerance and respect for the rights of religious free exercise. The Religious Liberty Amendment proposed by Senator Armstrong is an appropriate response to the District of Columbia's actions.

This issue is one primarily of the right of all Americans to establish educational institutions which reflect their most deeply held beliefs and to maintain the integrity of those institutions. For a Christian college to be compelled to give support to groups which advocate sexual activity outside of marriage would violate thousands of years of church teaching and two centuries of constitutional practice.

We respect the rights of the people of the District of Columbia. But the constitutional guarantees of religious liberty cannot be abrogated by local elected legislatures. We also offer no condemnation of homosexual persons nor do we advocate a denial of their constitutional rights as citizens. But those rights cannot be so construed as to require Christians to approve of—and even to subsidize—homosexual conduct.

We hope that Senator Armstrong's Religious Liberty Amendment will once again be supported by strong majorities in both parties in Congress. The revision of the amendment to meet judicial objections should clear the way for its speedy enactment.

STATEMENT OF THE CHRISTIAN COLLEGE COALITION

The Christian College Coalition hereby expresses its support of The Nation's Capital Religious Liberty and Academic Freedom Act, amending Section 1-2520 of the District of Columbia Code (1981 edition).

The Christian College Coalition is a North American association of seventy-seven denominational and interdenominational colleges and universities. We are committed to securing religious freedom for all persons and institutions in our pluralistic society and to holding each institution accountable to maintaining its integrity as it excercises this freedom.

The Religious Liberty and Academic Freedom Act sends an important message to those who would ignore the Constitutional right of the free exercise of religion that we enjoy. This Act is an effort to secure for religious educational institutions in the District of Columbia their legitimate right to withhold recognition and funding to student groups which advocate positions inimical to their institution's religious beliefs. We are compelled to support the Act because of the current history of judicial rulings regarding Georgetown University and the 1988 Armstrong Amendment. Our purpose is not to deny any party their basic civil rights nor the District of Columbia the ability to govern itself. We ask that all hear us when we state that our concern here is that of religious freedom.

Finally, we believe that religious institutions should not be in the business of coercing public institutions into accepting a morality that is based on religious tenets. We therefore ask that those same public institutions respect the right of religious institutions to be free from being coerced into submitting to the prevailing winds of public policy that violate religious freedom.

STATEMENT OF THE CENTER FOR LAW AND RELIGIOUS FREEDOM CONCERNING THE 1989 ARMSTRONG AMENDMENT

Religious freedom is not a partisan matter. Democrats and Republicans alike have called it America's First Liberty. Free exercise of religion is an inalienable right, guaranteed to all Americans by the First Amendment to the Constitution. A central aspect to religious liberty is the right of religious schools and colleges to teach religious values to their students.

The issue before us today is whether religious institutions, including universities, are free to withhold financial support and other services from groups whose views and practices violate the religious tenets of the institution.

The Center for Law and Religious Freedom of the Christian Legal Society believes that the action of the United States Senate in adopting Senator William Armstrong's amendment to the District of Columbia appropriations law is consistent with the spirit of America's First Liberty. All levels of government have a duty to protect fundamental First Amendment freedoms and to interfere with those freedoms only when a governmental interest is truly compelling.

Religious schools and colleges enjoy no less protection under the Constitution than other private institutions in our society. The NAACP cannot be forced to subsidize an organization promoting racial discrimination. The Washington Post cannot be forced to accept advertising that offends its editorial policy and community standards. Similarly, it is unconstitutional to force religious institutions to subsidize groups that promote lifestyles and practices that violate their religious beliefs.

The Georgetown University decision in the District of Columbia Court of Appeals was incorrect not only in ignoring the constitutional rights of that University, but also in misconstruing the local statute. A correct reading of the law would have recognized that Georgetown did not discriminate against any person because of homosexual orientation or even homosexual practice, but rather declined to support groups that advocated and promoted behavior held to be immoral by the Roman Catholic Church. Georgetown's opposition would have been the same if the student group in question had been one composed entirely of heterosexuals who advocated pre-marital sex or any other practice inconsistent with Catholic moral and religious teaching.

The District of Columbia Human Rights Act undermines the constitutional rights of religious educational institutions, a defect which the Armstrong amendment seeks to correct. This amendment is in harmony with the decisions of the Supreme Court. The Court has ruled that a private person or organization may not be forced to subsidize or endorse speech with which it disagrees. Thus, in Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974), a Florida statute requiring newspapers to give free reply space on their editorial pages to political candidates who had been criticized in the press was declared unconstitutional as a violation of the First Amendment rights of newspaper editors to choose what to print. Similarly, in Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Public Utilities Commission, 475 U.S. 1 (1986), the Supreme Court struck down a state regulatory requirement that utility companies include in their billing envelopes flyers prepared by a ratepayers' organization. Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209 (1977), applies the same principles to prohibit an employer from requiring a non-union employee as a condition to continuing employment, to contribute to the support of an ideological cause that he opposes. These cases, and others, stand for the proposition that a private entity, like a religious university, may not be required to provide services, facilities or financial support to groups advocating values and practices that undermine the institution's beliefs.

Under the Supreme Court's decisions, including Corporation of the Presiding Bishop v. Amos, 483 U.S. 327 (1987), it seems likely that Congress could have gone much further in protecting the religious beliefs of private religious schools without violating any constitutional provision. Permissible legislation might include an amendment permitting such schools to refuse to admit avowed homosexuals as students, when this is required by religious tenets. This amendment, however, is very limited. It gives to religious institutions only what they already have under the First Amendment: The right not to be forced to promote and encourage speech that advocates violation of their sincerely-held religious beliefs.

On Tuesday of this week, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit held that the 1988 version of the Armstrong amendment unconstitutionally violates the First Amendment rights of the members of the D.C. Council. That ruling was surprising given the fact that Congress has used the same procedure to amend District laws on many occasions. However, regardless of whether the court's decision is correct, it clearly has no relevance to the current amendment, which will amend the Human Rights Act directly without any action or speech on the part of Council members.

The United States Senate, by passing the Armstrong amendment, has taken a much needed first step to protect religious schools from the harsh and constitutionally defective District of Columbia statute.

STATEMENT OF DR. JOHN C. HOLMES, ASSISTANT TO THE EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR FOR GOVERNMENT INFORMATION, ASSOCIATION OF CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS INTERNATIONAL

The Association of Christian Schools International, an association of more than 2,700 evangelical Protestant religious schools throughout the United States and in the District of Columbia, commends Senator Armstrong for proposing and the U.S. Senate for passing the "Nation's Capital Religious Liberty and Academic Freedom Amendment." For many years ACSI has supported attempts by government through the legislative process and in the court proceedings to exempt religious institutions from unconstitutional governmental control.

No religious school, whether it is church owned, church affiliated or with a lay religious board, should be forced by government to comply with laws hostile to basic religious beliefs. A religious school in the District of Columbia must have the right to set reasonable rules and policies which protect the common good of its community of faith based on the school's understanding of God's Word, the Bible. No school should be forced to advocate or support an opposite moral position to its own sincerely held belief system.

Senator Armstrong's Religious Liberty and Academic Freedom Amendment allows those groups advancing contrary views that the religious school to continue to do so. But such groups are not subsidized by the religious school on its campus. Our hope is that the Senator's amendment will set an example for state and local governments to use as they increasingly deal with the progressive infringement of the First Amendment Rights of religious institutions.

The Association of Christian Schools International stands ready to do whatever we can to support the principle of religious freedom here adopted by the Senate to defend Religious Freedom on the District of Columbia and throughout this fair land of ours.

STATEMENT OF GOOD NEWS—A FORUM FOR SCRIPTURAL CHRISTIANITY WITHIN THE UNITED METHODIST CHURCH

(By James V. Heidinger II)

We heartily support the Armstrong Amendment to Section 1-2520 of the District of Columbia Code, which is Section 141 and was adopted by the Senate on 9/14/89.

We are glad we can let our voice be heard on this matter.●

IRA'S AND CAPITAL GAINS: WE CAN AFFORD BOTH

● Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I rise today to applaud the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee, Senator LLOYD BENTSEN, for offering a proposal to expand the tax benefits for individual retirement accounts [IRA]. The chairman's IRA proposal is an important step toward reducing the Tax Code's bias against saving and investment.

Regrettably, Senator BENTSEN views IRA's as an alternative to the capital gains tax cut proposal now pending in the House of Representatives, claiming that we cannot afford both of these measures.

I believe that we should enact both proposals. Expanding IRA's and cutting the capital gains tax would attack the most severe economic problem in America—the Tax Code's multiple taxation of income that is saved and invested.

Generally speaking, funds for saving and investment come from income that has already been taxed at ordinary income tax rates. This income is taxed once again when the investment produces income in the form of interest, dividends or capital gains. The result is that individuals are discouraged from saving for their retirement and investing in America's competitive future. Instead, income is channeled into current consumption which is free of Federal income tax.

We can afford both a properly crafted IRA and a capital gains tax cut. Our distinguished colleague, Senator WILLIAM ROTH has proposed an IRA bill, S. 1256, the "Save America Act of 1989." This bill would actually raise revenues in the early years after enactment, as opposed to the Bentsen IRA plan, which would lose roughly $8 billion a year for the first 3 years.

The Roth IRA would allow tax benefits at the time of withdrawal, instead of the up-front tax deduction proposed in the Bentsen plan. It raises revenue by taxing previously deductible IRA contributions if depositors chose to transfer the funds into the new IRA-Plus account. The money saved in the IRA-Plus and all interest earnings will be tax free upon retirement. IRA-Plus savers can also withdraw funds tax free before retirement to buy a home, pay for catastrophic illness, or cover education costs. IRA-Plus offers a tax credit for low-income taxpayers of up to 25 percent of their contribution.

More importantly, the Roth proposal would actually provide greater benefits to America's middle-income workers than the Bentsen plan. According to the Treasury Department, 84 percent of the tax benefits under the Bentsen IRA plan would go to those with incomes of $50,000 and up. I highly recommend that my colleagues read the cogent article by Senator ROTH in the September 27 Wall Street Journal, which provides further details on how his proposal would work. I will ask that it be included in the RECORD following my remarks.

Mr. President, the combination of the Roth IRA-Plus plan and the Bush-Jenkins capital gains tax cut plan would actually raise over $3 billion in tax revenues a year for each of the first 3 years. As savings and investment rates rise, the expanding economy will bring in a permanent stream of rising tax revenues. Clearly, we can afford both an expansion of IRA benefits and a cut in the capital gains tax.

Mr. President, our tax system is holding our economy back. The multiple layers of taxation on savings and investment is robbing America of its future economic potential. We must solve this problem by enacting a revenue-winning cut in the capital gains tax—and expanding IRA's along the lines proposed by Senator ROTH. These two proposals will result in a flood of savings and investment which in turn means more jobs, more financial security and a higher standard of living for all Americans.

Again, I want to commend Senator BENTSEN for supporting an expansion in IRA's. I look forward to working with him in crafting an affordable tax plan that combines both IRA's and the capital gains tax cut when the Senate begins consideration of the budget reconciliation package.

I ask that the article to which I referred be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

A BETTER PLAN THAN BENTSEN'S

(By Wiliam V. Roth)

Americans need the Individual Retirement Account. When Congress passed the 1986 Tax Reform Act that pulled the teeth from the effective IRA program, then in place, my office rang loud with phone calls from angry Delawareans who had trusted Congress's earlier IRA legislation. These people were upset that a program which had grown to represent a quarter of personal saving was being cut. They were upset that Congress was attacking their nest egg, stripping them of a good program that led toward self-reliance.

CONGRESS'S MISTAKE

Congress has seen the consequence of the mistake it made by cutting the program: Annual contributions declined by almost $25 billion, a serious drop that adversely affects our gross national product and America's ability to compete in the global community. The time has come to bring back the IRA. To correct the mistake, in June I introduced an expanded IRA, known as the IRA-Plus, and earlier this month Senate Finance Committee Chairman Lloyd Bentsen (D., Texas) also supported the expansion of IRAs. Both plans represent significant steps toward reviving this important program.

However, the Bentsen plan is proposed as an alternative to President Bush's capital gains tax cuts, another measure needed to encourage investment in America. To exchange one for another would be like trading the tires on a car for a tank of gas. Both are needed if the machine is to work properly and progress is to be made. More important, the IRA, if properly crafted, could be combined with the capital gains tax cut, instead of being a substitute for it. Handled correctly, the IRA-Plus could actually raise revenues in the early years after enactment, a necessary and attractive feature in this time of deficits.

Where Sen. Bentsen's plan will cost the federal government around $8 billion in its first three years, my IRA-Plus should actually raise revenue for the government while providing a greater payoff for the contributor. This is done by shifting the contributor's benefit to the time of withdrawal, rather than offer the tax deduction up front, and by allowing current IRA depositors to transfer their funds to an IRA-Plus—provided that they pay a tax on the previously deductible contributions. My IRA-Plus requires after-tax contributions, but then allows the contributor to withdraw the earnings after age 59½, completely tax free. This gives our senior citizens the security of knowing that once they have paid taxes on the earned income during their working years, the money saved in an IRA-Plus, and all interest, will be tax free at the time of retirement. Also, the IRA-Plus offers a tax credit for low-income taxpayers of up to 25% of their contribution.

Even if the money is withdrawn before retirement—to purchase a home, pay for education, or cover catastrophic health care bills—the withdrawal remains tax free. Sen. Bentsen's proposal allows for early withdrawal, without penalty, only for paying for a home and/or for education.

The differences between my IRA-Plus option and the Bentsen plan seem even more poignant with this example:

If a couple contributes $2,000 a year from the time they're 30, and receives an 8% yield on their investment, they could, under my plan, withdraw $23,080 tax-free each and every year after reaching 59½. Under the Bentsen plan, the same investment would yield $19,618 in annual after-tax retirement income, if the couple is in the 15% bracket; $16,617, if the couple is in the 28% bracket, and $15,454 a year if they are in the 33% bracket.

These examples do not take into account the effect of the future value of the annual tax deduction offered under the Bentsen plan. If the tax saving were invested, the Bentsen IRA might prove more attractive, but still would not yield as well as the IRA-Plus. And the sad truth is that for most workers the income from saving with the current IRA program, or through the Bentsen plan, will be taxed more heavily after retirement than it would have been taxed during the earning years, largely due to the Social Security Benefit Tax and the Medicare surtax. Consequently, at a time when American seniors need a tax break the most, they will be faced with a higher tax bill on their retirement income.

The IRA-Plus rewards thrift, encourages self-reliance and creates incentives to save for retirement while providing the flexibility to cover many of life's necessary demands. And by helping Americans save, the IRA-Plus, combined with the capital gains tax cut, will help America secure its industrial leadership into the future.●

MEXICO'S LIVESTOCK IMPORT REGULATIONS

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise to call your attention to a matter of great importance to livestock producers in my State of New Mexico as well as throughout the country. In the past few months, the Republic of Mexico has issued new regulations concerning the importation of livestock from the United States. These new regulations banned female slaughter animals going into Mexico. Excessive requirements for health testing, branding, and other forms of animal identification were also imposed. I am very pleased to let you know that representatives of Mexico's department of agriculture have written to the administration to formally announce changes in these provisions.

In a September 26, 1989, letter to Jo Ann Smith, Assistant Secretary for Marketing and Inspection Services at USDA, Mexico announced changes which will be effective on October 1, 1989. Of great importance for sheep producers in my State of New Mexico, the ban on slaughter ewes will be lifted. Female slaughter goats, hogs, and cattle will also be allowed into Mexico. Cattle destined for slaughter in an approved facility in Mexico will not require testing for turberculosis. Further, all cattle destined for slaughter will not be required to be branded with a "U."

Mr. President, I would like to commend officials in both the United States and Mexico for their actions on this matter. Secretary Yeutter, Ms. Jo Ann Smith, and their staff have done a fine job of negotiating with their counterparts in Mexico. Their representation of the concerns of the livestock industry in the United States must be recognized. I also appreciate the work of the Secretary of Agriculture in Mexico, Lic. Jorge de la Vega Dominguez and his staff for their efforts toward the elimination of trade barriers between our countries.

There remains, however, a very problematic issue which has not been resolved. Mexico has designated livestock crossing quarantine facilities in the United States through which all livestock must pass enroute to Mexico. To date, five facilities in Texas, three in Arizona and one in California have been approved.

As a matter of fairness, I think this situation where New Mexico is the only border State without livestock facility designation should be corrected. Otherwise, more than 400 miles of the border will not be served by a livestock crossing facility. In fiscal year 1987, $2.7 million was appropriated by Congress to maintain and upgrade the port of entry at Columbus because of the importance of this site to trade between the United States and Mexico.

Mr. President, my distinguished colleague Senator GRAMM is joining me today in sending letters to President Bush and the Trade Representative outlining our concerns about livestock quarantine facility designation. I ask that you include our letter to President Bush in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET,
Washington, DC, September 27, 1989.

Hon. GEORGE BUSH,
President, The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: As you prepare for your meeting with President Salinas of Mexico next week, we want to make you aware of a problem between our two countries concerning livestock exports to Mexico.

Earlier this year, the government of Mexico imposed a series of restrictive trade regulations on livestock entering that country from the United States. Subsequent negotiations between the United States and Mexico have resulted in the removal of many of the original restrictions; however, a severe problem remains unresolved.

The government of Mexico has issued unprecedented demands that all livestock moving into that country be reinspected at and shipped from designated quarantine facilities in the United States. To date, Mexican officials have designated a mere nine facilities: five in Texas, three in Arizona and one in California. New Mexico is the only border state which has not received any designation of livestock facilities.

Historically, livestock shipments from the United States have been exported through more than forty privately owned, commercial facilities in Texas, New Mexico, Arizona and California. Due to this reduction in eligible facilities, we anticipate unnecessary and costly bottlenecks in exporting animals.

In Texas, only those facilities owned and operated by the Texas Department of Agriculture have been approved. On a per-head basis, fees charged at these state-owned export facilities are five times greater than those charged by private enterprises. We cannot allow any government entity to usurp the functions successfully performed by the private sector.

While we support efforts by the United States Trade Representative to reach a Framework Understanding between the United States and Mexico, we consider this trade restriction an impediment to reaching such an agreement. In your meetings with President Salinas next week, we urge you to seek his commitment to eliminate this obstacle to trade between our two countries.

Sincerely,

PETE V. DOMENICI.
PHIL GRAMM.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I rise today to reemphasize the signficance of the problems our distinguished colleague from New Mexico, Senator DOMENICI, has just discussed and the impact they have had on livestock producers in my State of Texas.

But first, I would like to thank him for his leadership on this issue. Senator DOMENICI was the first Member of the U.S. Senate to recognize the significance of these new trade restrictions and the damage they would inflict upon our livestock producers. Back in early August, during the Senate debate on the Disaster Assistance Act of 1989, Senator DOMENICI authored Senate Resolution 168, which I cosponsored, to address this matter. Senate Resolution 168 called upon Secretary of Agriculture Clayton Yeutter and U.S. Trade Representative Carla Hills to review this situation and to work with the appropriate officials in Mexico to achieve free livestock trade between our two countries. This resolution was adopted as an amendment to the Senate disaster bill.

As my distinguished colleague from New Mexico has just indicated, the Bush administration has been responsive to this roadblock to trade with Mexico. Through pressure from the United States Department of Agriculture and the United States livestock industry, the Government of Mexico has agreed to eliminate or substantially modify many of these new trade restrictions effective October 1, 1989.

Unfortunately, however, this relief has not come soon enough to help some sectors of the U.S. livestock industry. Most notably, estimates indicate that sheep producers have lost over 41 million due to the regulation imposed August 1, 1989, prohibiting importation of female livestock into Mexico for slaughter. In recent years, a full 75 percent of the old ewes produced in Texas have been shipped to Mexico. Although this restriction will be lifted on October 1, the vast majority of old ewes are sent to Mexico during August, September, and October. It doesn't take an economist to understand why old ewe prices have been knocked way down this year when the major market for these animals was totally closed off during the peak marketing season.

Finally, Mr. President, I want to express my deep concern over the greatest remaining restriction imposed by the Government of Mexico. As Senator DOMENICI stated, Mexico is demanding that all livestock shipped from the United States to Mexico be reinspected at and shipped through designated quarantine facilities in the United States.

In Texas, only those export pens owned and operated by the Texas Department of Agriculture [TDA] have been approved. I have been contracted by many cattle, sheep, goat, and hog producers from Texas who are deeply concerned about the unfairness and impracticality of this requirement.

Texas producers who export to Mexico have typically had the inspections necessary for export health certification conducted at any one of 15 or 20-privately owned, commercial export facilities located along the border. Fees charged at these private pens generally run around 25 cents per head, compared to $1.25 to $1.50 per head at the five TDA facilities that have recently been designated by Mexico.

The TDA pens were not designed for the exportation of large numbers of slaughter animals; they were designed for handling small groups of breeding animals that require strict quarantine facilities. As evidence, the Texas pork Producers Association has told me that each TDA pen has only one loading and unloading ramp; there are no scales available to use in sorting groups to be loaded onto trucks; and the TDA facilities basically operate on an 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. schedule even though slaughter livestock are typically exported through commercial facilities at any time of the day or night.

Mr. President, it makes no sense to allow Government bureaucracies to consume, by regulation, the performance of services successfully provided by the private sector. If we permit the Government of Mexico to require this in the United States, we would be surrendering the principles of capitalism and private enterprise upon which this great nation was founded. For this reason, Senator DOMENICI and I have written President Bush and U.S. Trade Representative Carla Hills requesting their support in resolving this serious problem.●

PROPOSALS TO PROTECT THE PHYSICAL INTEGRITY OF THE FLAG OF THE UNITED STATES; SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 180 AND S. 1338

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I ask that my name be removed as a cosponsor of S. 1338, the Flag Protection Act of 1989.

The Senate Judiciary Committee has completed its hearings regarding the various proposals to protect the physical integrity of the flag of the United States. I believe that they have been very helpful to both the committee and to the Senate.

Our deliberations have focused on whether or not last June's Supreme Court decision should be overturned.

And, if so, by what method—constitutional amendment or statute.

Mr. President, the Judiciary Committee, the Senate, and the Congress have the responsibility to exercise leadership on important issues. We should not habitually check the latest public opinion polls to dictate how to act. However, I think it is compelling to note that recent surveys indicate that the vast majority of Americans believe that the Supreme Court was wrong. They want us to act. This sentiment has been confirmed by many of our witnesses.

Some will suggest that passions have cooled on this issue. Or that Gregory Johnson's act was a one-time-only stunt by a crackpot.

Quite the contrary, there are many budding Gregory Johnsons out there. Indeed, a recent news account told of a Penn State University college professor who burned a flag in her classroom, to promote discussion.

Our hearings and recent events have reinforced my belief that we are obliged to respond to the Supreme Court. I don't take such a responsibility lightly.

I was an original cosponsor of S. 1338, the Flag Protection Act of 1989, which is intended to protect the flag by amending section 700 of title 18, the Federal Flag Desecration Statute. I supported the bill because if a statute would suffice, that route might be preferable.

However, like Senator THURMOND—I am not certain that a statute will survive a further legal challenge.

A statute lacks the certainty of an amendment. The fact is that no statute is guaranteed either expeditious review in the courts or automatic constitutionality. The article the courts cannot hand down advisory opinions. Rather, courts decide only a specific case in controversy; in other words, a proper test case. Thus, at the very least, it will take a number of years to determine whether any statute will pass constitutional muster.

And, like Senator HATCH, I am uncomfortable with attempting to overturn a Supreme Court decision—which is grounded in the Constitution—by the passage of a mere statute. We have had some very persuasive testimony on this point.

I prefer the proposed constitutional amendment before us—Senate Joint Resolution 180—as the only real vehicle capable of protecting the flag.

In my view, it will not change the Constitution—as many critics have charged—rather it will return us to the status quo, one day before the Court's decision.

I appreciate the concern that Congress should not act in haste by amending the Constitution. Of course, nothing the Congress does regarding an amendment to the Constitution is automatic or pro forma.

By very thoughtful and intentional design, the passage of an amendment signals only the beginning of the process—one that is cumbersome at best.

As we all know, the States must have their opportunity to speak to the issue through ratification. That is how it should be, and thankfully, that is how it is.

I know many of my colleagues fear the effect that an amendment might—in theory—have on some first amendment rights.

And of course we must be serious and thoughtful in our deliberations about a change in the Constitution. But remember, that great document is not inviolate. The Founding Fathers—to their credit—provided for amendments, albeit through a most cumbersome process—and properly so.

Indeed, a number of the amendments are a direct response to Supreme Court decisions. These include the 11th—prohibiting the exercise of Federal Judicial power over a case brought by a citizen of one State against another State; the 13th—abolishing slavery in the United States; the 14th—granting the former slaves citizenship and all rights and privileges pertaining thereto; and the 16th—establishing the Federal income tax.

On thoughtful reflection, and having cited my serious reservations regarding S. 1338—based on the testimony—I voted against the passage of S. 1338 in the Judiciary Committee. As you know, the committee voted to report S. 1338 favorably to the full Senate.

However, I did vote for Senate Joint Resolution 180 as the only real solution to restore the law to the status quo prior to the Supreme Court's June decision in Texas versus Johnson. Unfortunately, the committee determined to report the proposed amendment unfavorably to the full Senate.

I look forward to the Senate's consideration of both measures in the near future.●

THE MAGNUSON FISHERY CONSERVATION AND MANAGEMENT ACT OF 1976 REGARDING AMERICAN LOBSTER

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, yesterday I joined with many of my distinguished New England colleagues to introduce a bill that will continue last year's efforts on an important fishing matter: the conservation of American lobster.

As my colleagues know, the waters of and around the United States have an abundance of renewable fishery resources that are extremely valuable to the economy of the country. To fully realize the potential of this resource, the Congress approved the Magnuson Fishery Management and Conservation Act of 1976. The key words are conservation and management. We recognized then that to make the most of this vast resource, we can't abuse it.

To keep the U.S. lobster population at a steady level, U.S. lobster fishermen have agreed to State and Federal minimum-size requirements, as well as a prohibition against the taking of eggbearing lobster. For these fishermen, these requirements are a long-term economic and environmental investment: they guarantee a steady, healthy lobster population. But the requirements also mean giving up potentially lucrative short-term benefits and losing some ability to compete with foreign fishermen.

I do not believe that U.S. fishermen should be penalized for being conservation-minded. Last year, during Finance Committee discussions, I worked hard for a provision in the United States-Canada Free Trade Agreement that would have required lobster-exporting countries to comply with United States lobster minimum size standards. This provision was approved by the committee, but wasn't included in the final enabling legislation.

The measure we have introduced will amend the Magnuson Act to prohibit in interstate commerce the shipping or selling of lobster or lobster parts that do not meet U.S. minimum-size standards. As the same time, it preserves States' ability to set minimum size and other standards under the Magnuson Act.

I believe this is an important bill that promotes responsible fishery management and conservation principles, and restores a fair economic balance for U.S. fishermen.●

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

GLOBAL FOREST EMERGENCY ACT

HON. JAMES H. SCHEUER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Global Forest Emergency Act, a bill aimed at reversing the catastrophic decline of the world's forests. The Global Forest Emergency Act sets a national policy of no net loss of forests. It directs the President to work with international leaders for a declaration of a global forest emergency and for a global policy of no net loss of forests. The bill directs the President to invite Japan to join with us in a joint United States-Japan Commission on Global Forest Restoration. Because precise figures on deforestation are not available, the bill directs U.S. participation in a global survey of forests and forest resources. Because present knowledge of forests is inadequate, the bill also creates an Endangered Forest Research Initiative to study forest ecology, sustainable yield forestry, and forest restoration.

Our forests are becoming disaster areas. Overcutting, acid rain, nonnative pests, and creeping development are devastating our forest resources. Forests worldwide are in critical condition—a state of emergency.

We are now aware of the destruction of the rich tropical rainforests with their treasure chests of biological diversity. Yet, we perceive this as a problem that could only occur far from the shores of the United States. Not true. Last January, Congressman AKAKA and I held a field hearing in Hawaii. We learned how the rainforests of Hawaii are being turned into wood chips. Rightly, we decry the destruction of the Amazon forests, but we fail to note that the rate of deforestation in Florida exceeds that of Brazil.

Ancient North American forests are being destroyed before our eyes as they are logged at unsustainable rates in the Pacific northwest and in the Tongass National Forest of Alaska. In the eastern United States and in Europe, forests are being ruined by acid rain and nonnative pests such as gypsy moths, hemlock woolly adelgids, pear thrips, and red pine scales. It is time for a national policy of no net loss of forests in the United States.

Just as the President's policy of no net loss of wetlands has directed action toward these valuable ecosystems, we need similar action in forest conservation.

Once we have a national policy of no net loss of forests, then we can carry that policy throughout the world. The situation is desperate in the nonindustrialized world where people deplete their forests in a daily search for cooking and heating fuel. They engage in unsustainable practices of deforestation to fulfill needs for agricultural lands and to produce export commodities to fight a crushing debt burden. In degrading the land for short-term gains, they deplete their biological capital—the forests with their life-sustaining biological diversity.

We are now aware of the importance of forests in the fight against global warming, one of the most serious threats facing our planet. Forests are the lungs of the world. They remove carbon dioxide from the air, thus alleviating a primary cause of the greenhouse effect. They return oxygen to the atmosphere, which makes life possible. We need to take dramatic steps to conserve existing forests, restore degraded forests, and plant more trees to fight the global warming.

Forests protect watersheds, prevent erosion, and provide the vast majority of natural products used by humans. All of these virtues are threatened by forest destruction. The costs of deforestation are staggering. We must plant trees to meet local needs for fuel wood in nonindustrialized countries. We must also support intensive use of industrial forests to take the pressure off the world's endangered virgin forests. According to British ecologist Norman Myers, if we made full use of the lands that have already been deforested or degraded, we would not have to cut another acre of forest primeval.

President Bush recently extolled the virtues of forests and reforestation, planting trees around the Nation, symbolically leading a new campaign to restore our American forests. Now it is time to go beyond symbolic gestures and take steps to save our forests.

Japan and the United States are the major users of forest products around the world. We must work together to help less prosperous countries ensure a sustainable supply of wood and other forest products. My bill would invite Japan to participate in a United States-Japan Commission to conduct reforestation projects around the world. I look forward to discussion with Japanese officials about how we can move forward in this endeavor.

We know that world forest acreage has been decreased by at least 15 percent in this century and that this rate is accelerating. Deforestation has reached critical proportions in many parts of the world. However, precise figures on forest cover and forest loss are not available. We need this information to target our efforts. My bill calls for U.S. participation in a global forest survey that will combine the use of satellite imagery and ground-based surveys. This will provide much better information than is currently available.

In order to conserve our forests and use them as renewable resources, we must increase our understanding of forests. The bill also calls for the Office of Science and Technology Policy to organize an Endangered Forest Research Initiative in forest ecology, sustainable yield forestry, and forest restoration.

The Global Forest Emergency Act will provide the leadership necessary to save our endangered forests. It provides the global perspective that is needed to save the forest for the trees, as a weapon against global change, and for other values that make forests indispensable to human existence. Along with my National Biological Diversity Conservation Act, which will soon be marked up by the Science Committee, this bill will create the American example of wise use of our forest resources that is vital as we lead the world toward forest conservation. I urge my colleagues to join with me as cosponsors of the Global Forest Emergency Act.

A section-by-section analysis of this bill follows:

GLOBAL FOREST EMERGENCY ACT

SECTION-BY-SECTION SUMMARY

Title

A bill to establish a national policy of "no net loss of forests," to direct the President to work for a declaration of a State of Emergency for Global Forests, to establish forest protection and forest restoration programs as a national priority, to support a global forest resource survey; to create an Endangered Forests Research Initiative and to initiate a joint United States-Japan effort for global forest restoration.

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

Sets out the short title of the bill as the "Global Forest Emergency Act."

SECTION 2. FINDINGS.

States that Congress finds that: Forests serve a vital purpose in moderating global climate change by storing carbon compounds; deforestation is a significant contributor to global climate change; the conditions of the world's forests are such that immediate action is needed to conserve existing forests and restore degraded forests; forests and wooded ecosystems are a vital resource for human well-being, providing wood and other products, climate moderation, oxygen production, watershed protection, habitat for plants and animals including people, scientific understanding, recreation and aesthetic value; world forest acreage has declined by more than 15% in the last century and the decline is accelerating toward catastrophic consequences; tropical forests are being destroyed at rates that significantly threaten the viability of these rich ecosystems; global deforestation is causing a loss of biological diversity unprecedented in human history; the quality of world forests is declining due to airborne pollutants, invasion by non-native pests, and loss of biological diversity; deforestation and forest degradation is leading to loss of homes and livelihood for people and is a significant contributor to poverty; continued deforestation and forest degradation is likely to lead to increased environmental problems (including global climate change and extinctions of massive numbers of plant and animal species) and economic and political instability caused by resource shortages; reforestation programs are presently unable to compensate for the loss of forests and will never be able to fully recreate forests in natural conditions with a full range of biological diversity; a major effort toward forest inventory, forest research, forest conservation, sustainable yield forestry and forest restoration including appropriate reforestation is necessary to maintain a healthy planet.

SECTION 3. PURPOSES.

States that the purposes of this Act are: to declare a national policy of no net loss of forests; to direct the President to declare a national forest emergency and to work toward an international policy of no net loss of forests globally; to direct appropriate agencies of the U.S. Government to work with the U.N. Food and Agricultural Organization in a global survey of forest resources; to support a special research initiative with international cooperation in forest ecology, sustainable yield forestry and forest restoration; to establish a joint United States-Japan commission on Global Forest Restoration to develop, support, and initiate a global program in forest restoration; to direct the appropriate agencies of the United States to work with appropriate international organizations and foreign nations in undertaking a sophisticated and diverse global effort to restore the forests of the planet and halt destruction of natural forests.

SECTION 4. DEFINITIONS.

Contains definitions of terms including "forest', "conserve" and "no net loss". The term "no net loss" is defined as meaning that for each forest that is destroyed, a forested area of equal size and with species diversity appropriate to the local conditions is to be restored within the same region.

SECTION 5. NATIONAL AND GLOBAL FOREST POLICY.

States that it is the policy of the United States that there shall be no net loss of forests within the United States and its territories and that forest conservation and sustainable use of forests, domestically and internationally, shall be a national priority. Directs the President to declare a national forest emergency and to work with other nations and international organizations for similar declarations. Directs all agencies of the United States to take all actions within their authority to conserve forests and support forest regeneration and restoration as appropriate to their mission. Directs the Council of Environmental Quality to establish national objectives to implement and promote the "no net loss of forests" policy.

SECTION 6. RESEARCH.

Directs the Administrator of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, the Chief of the Forest Service, the Administrator of the Agency for International Development and the heads of other appropriate agencies to work with the U.S. Food and Agricultural Organization and other international bodies toward a global survey of the world's forests and forest resources. Directs the Agency for International Development and the U.S. Forest Service to work together to support and provide technical assistance for national-level forest inventories around the world.

Directs the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy (OSTP) through the Federal Coordinating Council on Science, Engineering, and Technology (FCCSET) to prepare a comprehensive research program in forest ecology and related fields, sustainable yield forestry, forest restoration, and reforestation, to be known as the Endangered Forest Research Initiative.

States that the Initiative shall include research roles for the National Science Foundation; U.S. Department of Agriculture, including the U.S. Forest Service; the National Park Service; the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service; the Environmental Protection Agency; the U.S. Agency for International Development; and other agencies, and shall include cooperative scientific programs with other Nations. States that the Initiative shall include research toward understanding the role of forests in ameliorating climate change, in preserving biological diversity, in preventing erosion, and in protecting watersheds shall include development of technologies and methodology for sustained yield forestry and forest restoration, especially the use of indigenous tress in reforestation, and development of indigenous crops in sustained yield agroforestry. Directs FCCSET to submit this Initiative to Congress within one year after passage of this Act. The recommendations contained in this Initiative are to be represented in the annual budget requests of the participating agencies and departments.

SECTION 7. UNITED STATES-JAPAN GLOBAL FOREST RESTORATION PROGRAM.

Directs the President to extend an invitation to the Government of Japan to participate in a joint United States-Japan Commission on Global Forest Restoration. This Commission is to provide financial and technical assistance to nations, international organizations, local and national nongovernmental organizations and industry to undertake a global forest restoration effort in order to conserve existing forests and to meet the demand for forests and forest products;

States that the objectives of this Commission are to develop, initiate and support a global forest restoration program and that this program shall seek to implement a global policy of no net loss of forests through conservation of existing forests, natural regeneration, and planting of additional trees in order to reduce the demand for wood from natural forests and to meet other human needs;

States that this program shall include forest restoration for all purposes including: amelioration of global climate change; conservation of biological diversity of natural forests; watershed protection and control of erosion; provision of wood for fuel and other local uses; and industrial forestry;

States that this program shall include training and education activities in forest conservation and restoration techniques;

States that the U.S. members of this Commission shall include: the Assistant Secretary of State for Oceans and International Environmental and Science Affairs; the Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs; the Administrator of the Agency for International Development; the Chief of the Forest Service; and other members as selected by the President.

CONGRATULATIONS TO TAIWAN

HON. CASS BALLENGER

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. BALLENGER. Mr. Speaker, as the 1980's draw to a close, one great and powerful nation, a trusted ally and valuable trading partner, appears ready to assume major status as a contributor to the global economy and to global polity—the Republic of China on Taiwan.

Only a great nation could have accomplished so much in so short a time, and continue to do so. Only a great leader like Taiwan's President Lee Teng-hui could gather such extensive political support so soon after taking office on January 13, 1988. And only great things will continue to come forth from a country such as the Republic of China, with its booming economy and firm foundation for democratic free enterprise.

As we prepare to celebrate Taiwan's 78th National Day, Tuesday, October 10, congratulations are due her leaders and her people for their achievements to date. A special word of thanks, also, to Taiwan's Representative Ding Mou-shih and Madame Ding Mou-shih. They have made the task of understanding Taiwan, our Asian ally, so much easier through their hospitality, wit, and charm.

SOME EFFECTIVE AID FOR THE POLISH ECONOMY

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, anyone who works in an up-to-date office in America knows how hard it would be to go back to the days before copy machines and electric typewriters, not to mention personal computers.

Yet that's where many business organizations in Poland find themselves today.

A constituent of mine, Mr. Reynold Hendrickson, has come up with an idea that would give American business men and women who believe in free market economics a chance to give their counterparts in Poland more than just moral support.

Give them those outdated but still very useful Selectric typewriters and Xerox copiers that are fast gathering dust in corporate storerooms, he says.

Direct American aid is one answer, but here is another way to give Polish entrepreneurs the tools to fashion a brighter, more productive future for their country.

IN HONOR OF FATHER GILBERT V. HARTKE, O.P.

HON. CONSTANCE A. MORELLA

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, the Hartke Theatre of the Catholic University of America is embarking on its 20th season of offering high-quality, affordable drama productions to residents of the Washington metropolitan area. On this 20th anniversary, I would like to remember the inspiring work of Rev. Gilbert V. Hartke, the Dominican priest whose visionary leadership guided the CUA drama department he founded more than 50 years ago.

At 10 p.m., Wednesday, October 4, 1989, WETA-TV 26, is airing an hour-long documentary of Father Hartke's life and work. Actress Helen Hayes, actors Larry Luckinbill and Jon Voight, and playwright John Pielmeier are among those in the film recalling Father Hartke's humor, kindness, and wisdom.

Father Hartke's traditions of hard work and religious and esthetic values helped shape the lives of several thousand students of diverse races, colors, and creeds and those students share their talents with others around the world.

Each year since President Harry S. Truman asked Father Hartke to put together a troupe of young actors and actresses to entertain American military forces abroad, CUA students have brightened the winter holidays of U.S. armed services stationed overseas by performing in musical revues on U.S. military basis in Europe and other far-flung locations.

Every summer, CUA drama majors teach English, drama and American popular culture to university students in Poznan, Poland.

Father Hartke founded the National Players in 1949. The Nation's oldest continuous repertory touring company, the Players enters its 41st year of bringing Shakespeare and other dramatists to audiences throughout the country. In addition, the drama department, which Father Hartke established, operates community outreach programs and offers special performances for high school and other groups.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the Catholic University's Hartke Theatre on its 20th anniversary. The theater is a fitting tribute to Father Hartke's service as priest and teacher.

BEST WISHES TO THE REPUBLIC OF CHINA ON TAIWAN

HON. CHARLES ROSE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, I am most honored to convey my best wishes to my friends in the Republic of China on Taiwan as they celebrate their 78th National Day on Tuesday, October 10, 1989.

The whole world has watched Taiwan's development from a poor island country into a major economic power today—all within a short period of 40 years. Today Taiwan is our fifth largest trading partner, enjoying $75 billion in foreign reserve and a per capita GNP of more than $6,500.

While enjoying its wealth, Taiwan is very much aware of the importance of sharing its "Taiwan experience" with less developed countries. Recently Taiwan established a $1 billion overseas fund; the goal is to aid those less developed countries to promote their economies and industrial growth.

I hope Taiwan, under the guidance of President Lee Teng-hui, Premier Lee Huan, State Minister Fredrick Chien, and Foreign Minister Lien Chan, will continue to prosper. I also hope that Taiwan's overseas fund will achieve the objective of helping less developed nations to help themselves.

TEDDY DOWNEY REMEMBERS HIS FRIEND, MICKEY LELAND

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I recently had the privilege of reading a moving article about our former colleague, Mickey Leland, which was prepared by an enterprising young journalist here in Washington, DC.

The journalist is Teddy Downey, 7-year-old son of Congressman TOM DOWNEY of New York. Teddy is a student at Brent Elementary School here in Washington, and is the editor, publisher, reporter, and circulation manager of "The Children's Newspaper," which he began recently and which he circulates to young people in his neighborhood.

When Mickey Leland died, many Americans were deeply saddened at the loss. Teddy Downey was one of those Americans. As his article makes clear, over the years, Mickey Leland had become an important part of the Downey household—coming to dinner often and sharing his love, good humor, and optimism with young Teddy.

With Mickey's passing, Teddy felt the need to express his sorrow and sense of loss. That's when his mother, Chris, suggested that he write down some remembrances of his friend, "Uncle Mickey." The result is the following article which I commend to the attention of my colleagues.

I'm reliably informed that Teddy already has announced his plan to write a book about Mickey. And judging from what this young man has accomplished in his brief 7 years, I'm pretty sure that it will be appearing in bookstores soon.

MICKEY LELAND

(By Teddy Downey, Age 7)

My mom was crying when he died. My dad was too. Mickey Leland was a great man. He was a congressman like my dad. My mom, my dad, Lauren and I treated him like one of the family. Mickey died in a plane crash. He crashed into a mountain. He was on a plane to Ethiopia to save starving hungry children. My mom and dad went to the funeral in Houston, Texas. That is three and a half hours from here. He has a wife, a boy, and a baby in her stomach.

We used to go out with him on Tuesdays for dinner. One time at dinner he brought his friend, Famous Amos, who makes wonderful, terrific cookies. His best friend is Ron Dellums.

One time Mickey Leland gave a speech on the floor of the House of Representatives and he spoke it in Spanish. He wanted to show the Members how difficult it was to speak one language. One other time Mickey flew to Ethiopia to unload one hundred pound bags of food for the starving people.

One other time Mickey Leland slept on the street on a cold winter's night to draw attention to the many homeless people. One of the best things about him is that he was very funny.

THE TRAGEDY OF OUR PUERTO RICAN BROTHERS

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mrs. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, the tragedy of the people of Puerto Rico is felt by all of us in south Florida but especially in the areas of my congressional district known as Allapattah and Wynwood. These two neighborhoods are home to most of Dade County's Puerto Rican population and it is here where the anguish and the frustration is felt the deepest.

I have had many constituents call our office in great despair because their loved ones are without food, water, adequate shelter and other basic necessities. They are crying out to their families but are unable to communicate due to lack of a functioning phone system or telegraph service.

This devastating hurricane has been doubly troublesome for the frail, the sick, and the elderly. They are confused about the chaos around them and are worried that they will soon run out of the medicine and the medical attention that they normally require.

Our brothers and sisters in Puerto Rico need our help very badly now. All of us should unite in showing our compassion and our willingness to help.

Puerto Ricans need just about everything right now, but after talking to the person in charge of the hurricane relief effort in the Puerto Rican Governor's office, I find that there are some basic staples which are in desperately short supply.

Among these such items are: Food such as cereal, crackers, canned goods, juices and milk; baby goods such as disposable diapers, milk formula and food, evaporated milk, baby wipes, and Pedialite (for upset stomachs); medicine such as Tylenol, Panadol, Keopectate, Donage, Maalox, and suppositories; clothes including underwear and shoes for both adults and children; hygiene products such as toothbrushes and toothpaste, combs, shaving cream, towels and soap; and household products including paper towels, gas lanterns, matches, batteries, plastic bags and propane gas.

Many from south Florida have already shown your compassion for others and have contributed financially as well as by giving of your time. For those who can do more, please consider donating some of the previously mentioned items to our unfortunate neighbors in Puerto Rico.

RADON TESTING FOR SAFE SCHOOLS ACT

HON. BART GORDON

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing a revised version of the Radon Testing for Safe Schools Act. I am pleased that Senator LAUTENBERG is introducing the companion bill in the Senate and hope that we can move quickly to enact this important legislation to protect children and teachers exposed to high radon levels in schools.

Radon is an odorless, colorless gas that results from the decay of uranium. The EPA estimates that radon exposure is the second largest cause of lung cancer in America, and children are particularly vulnerable. But radon is an unseen killer. Until you test, you don't know if there is radon in your home or in you child's school. Unless you test, you may only discover radon's deadly effects 15 or 20 years from now when your doctor diagnoses lung cancer.

I originally introduced this bill, H.R. 2210, in May in response to the alarming results of EPA's initial survey of radon levels in our schools. In this survey, middle Tennessee schools showed the highest radon levels in the Nation. The survey also revealed dangerous radon levels in schools in Washington, Montana, New Mexico, Maine, New Jersey, Illinois, Minnesota, Wyoming, Missouri, and Georgia.

I believe that parents, teachers, and school officials have a right to know about radon hazards in our schools. This is the premise behind my Radon Testing for Safe Schools Act. It is far better to invest a little money today on testing for radon than to spend a great deal of money in the future on treatment for lung cancer.

Since May, I have listened to suggestions made by concerned organizations and have worked with Senator LAUTENBERG to make some improvements which strengthen my original bill. The revised Radon Testing for Safe Schools Act requires all schools in EPA-designated radon hot spots to test for radon. Test results must be made available to parent, teacher, and citizen groups and testing must be conducted by EPA or State-approved radon testing firms or individuals. The bill authorizes $30 million over 5 years to fund loan or grant assistance for needy schools to cover the costs of radon testing and mitigation. Testing is required; mitigation is strongly encouraged. The bill also calls for followup reports from the EPA so we can continue to track radon levels in schools throughout the country.

I believe we have an obligation to let parents and teachers in high-risk radon areas know how much radon exists in our schools. I invite my colleagues to join me in supporting this important health care legislation.

REFORMS STILL NEEDED IN THE SOVIET UNION

HON. PETER H. KOSTMAYER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, as cochairman, along with my colleague JOHN MILLER, of the Congressional Call to Conscience, it is appropriate at this time, as the Jewish holidays approach, that we consider those of the Jewish faith in the Soviet Union.

In recent months, we have noticed some progress in the Soviet Union. Jewish emigration has increased. And although there is still much room for improvement, 33,444 Soviet Jews have emigrated from January thru August, 1989.

We have also seen recent openings of cultural institutions, such as the Mikhoels Jewish Cultural Center. These are notable. In some cases, however, institutions have been established as concessions to Western Jewish leaders and not by the demands of independent Soviet Jews.

We also have taken note of the new Soviet policy of cultural autonomy which was adopted in the summer of 1988. This policy provides that "ethnic groups that have no national territories should be granted their national cultural needs * * * and to satisfy their religious requirements * * *." But, Mr. Speaker, such autonomy has not been officially extended to Jews.

In the next session of the Supreme Soviet and the Congress of Peoples' Deputies, laws will be introduced and debated that would reform and institutionalize basic human rights and freedoms in the Soviet Union, including emigration, expression, thought, press, and religious conscience. Soviet Jews have been singled out for religious and cultural persecution since the Bolshevik revolution. They have been the target of the government's virulent policy of antisemitism. Because they do not have political representation, Jews have not had the ability to conduct an adequate defense.

People of faith in the Soviet Union share a common concern that only real reform of the laws on freedom of religion, conscience, and emigration will prevent antireform elements from reversing even the slight progress that has been made. The last 70 years of Soviet rule have been characterized by an unremitting governmental onslaught on Jewish culture and religion amounting to attempted cultural genocide. Jewish religious activity has been suppressed, institutions closed, religious and cultural leaders arrested.

For the Soviet Union's estimated three million Jews, there are less than 90 active synagogues. For Moscow's 250,000 Jews, there exists only the Moscow Choral Synagogue and the Marina Roshad Synagogue. The Rabbi at the Choral Synagogue, Adolph Shayevitz, is a member of the Anti-Zionist Committee, the Soviet appointed organization which propounds the government's antisemitic policy.

The hunger for Jewish knowledge and national self-identity has led to the emergence of several Jewish organizations, but they are understandably weak and terrified by popular anti-Semitism which is tolerated by the Government. Many of these groups are afraid of having any connection with Israel, fearing official accusation as being agents of the international Zionist conspiracy. Authorities have a policy to control the development of Jewish cultural activity. In this policy, the Government supports groups led by anti-Zionist committee members or official Jews who represent government interests.

Who knows what the future holds for Soviet Jews, Mr. Speaker. The issues of religious and cultural freedom and the history of State-sponsored anti-Semitism are not inseparable problems. How Gorbachev deals with anti-Semitism and to long overdue demands by Jews for religious freedom is key to his credibility of promised reforms in many areas of Soviet society and in dealings with the West.

The Department of State has confirmed that "while government harassment of Jewish religious and cultural activities has abated" under glasnost, "widespread anti-Semitic discrimination is still encountered at the lower levels of government bureaucracy throughout the Soviet Union, and in the general Russian populace. This type of antisemitism has increased markedly in the context of Glasnost * * *" It is also ironic that "groups such as pamyat today appear to have picked up, to a more intense level, the antisemitism that the Soviet Government policy is downplaying." Many Jews in the Soviet Union today have reason to fear not only that the fall of Gorbachev and the reformers allied with him would bring back the kind of official anti-Semitism that was in vogue prior to 1987, but that this institutional anti-Semitism would be exacerbated by populist and virulent pamyat activity. It is clear that the Soviet Union remains a profoundly anti-Semitic and officially atheistic nation.

Mr. Speaker, Vladimir Dashevsky, a leader of the Jewish religious community in the Soviet Union summarizes the situation as follows:

"These are times of enormous instability in the Soviet Union. In terms of freedom of conscience and religious practice, there has been some partial progress particularly in the reduction of official intimidation of religious believers. But this progress is given as a favor to demonstrate the good will of the authorities; it is not accorded as a matter of right to Soviet Jews and other religious communities. Therefore, we cannot perceive the progress as substantive or real until or unless it is based on rights guaranteed by institutionalization into law and then implemented."

We hope that someday in the very near future, Soviet Jews will be able to practice their religion openly, without fear or persecution and hatred. Mr. Speaker, during the Jewish holidays, we should all remember the continuing plight of Jews in the Soviet Union and pray that they will soon be able to enjoy the religious freedoms that we enjoy. Mr. Speaker, to Jews in the Soviet Union, as the Chairs of the Congressional Call to Conscience, Congressman JOHN MILLER and I say, "L'shanah tovah."

SUPPORT BALLENGER ESOP BILL

HON. CASS BALLENGER

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. BALLENGER. Mr. Speaker, later today I will be introducing legislation to improve upon proposals to limit the broad ownership of corporate stock. This bill will specifically aid the establishment of Employee Stock Ownership Plans [ESOP's].

My bill will do three things:

First require the ESOP to hold at least 20 percent of the corporation's stock before the ESOP lender interest exclusion is available;

Second, limit the ESOP lender interest exclusion—even if the 20-percent threshold is met—to loan proceeds of $100 million or less; and Third, allow an exception to the $100 million limit for ESOP's which would hold over 50 percent of the corporation's stock.

This legislation is being introduced to ensure current law continues to promote employee ownership. I want to encourage this concept. Unfortunately, ESOP's are under attack by some in Congress for short-term revenue gains. I believe Congress should continue to foster public policy that promises hard-working Americans a say in our free enterprise system. With the support of my legislation, employees will have this chance.

SECTION 89; REPEAL, NOT REPAIR

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, last night by a vote of 390 to 36, the House of Representatives approved the repeal of section 89, the controversial section of the Tax Code which attempted to equalize benefits between all levels of employees. This victory could be the first retreat in what many see as an unprecedented assault on American small enterprise.

Small businessmen and women will sleep easier tonight knowing that, in this case, their voices were finally heard. Yesterday's vote came after a concerted effort by small business throughout the Nation to put an end to a section of the Tax Code both unfair and impossible. The letters poured into my office and the message registered loud and clear. Congress had made a mistake. Chairman of the House Small Business Committee, JOHN LAFALCE, introduced the main piece of repeal legislation which gained over 300 cosponsors in the House. I am proud to have been an original cosponsor of the repeal bill.

Despite this solid opposition the Ways and Means Committee was more concerned with repair, not with repeal. While I am not aware of any nationwide survey of the popularity of section 89, I will venture a guess that among our business community, you could not find a more unpopular tax. Like it or not, the social engineers and tax advocates in Washington are forced to accept another defeat at the hands of the American people.

I hope this repeal vote will come as the first of many victories for Tax Code reform. High capital gains tax rates, and the catastrophic care surtax, represent other battles against taxes American's don't want and don't need. It's late in the game but it seems Congress is finally recognizing that the survival of small business, and the middle class has a great deal to do with our own survival.

WELCOME TO THE SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS

HON. CONSTANCE A. MORELLA

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in welcoming the gereral conference of Seventh-Day Adventists' world headquarters to Montgomery County, MD. The Seventh-Day Adventists have, of course, been our good neighbors for years, and they have served the residents of Montgomery County well. The Washington Adventist Hospital, Shady Grove Adventist Hospital, and Columbia Union College are well-known in Maryland's Eighth Congressional District. These institutions are but three among the ministries of the Seventh-Day Adventists worldwide. The Adventist development and relief agency is assisting victims of Hurricane Hugo in Puerto Rico with emergency supplies of tents, powdered milk, and other essentials. Other devastated Caribbean areas are also receiving funds from the Adventist relief agency.

The world headquarters bring an international presence to our community. One hundred and ninety countries and 700 different languages are represented at the world headquarters.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud that the conference of Seventh-Day Adventists' world headquarters is now a part of our community. I congratulate the members of the general conference and President Neal C. Wilson on this move. I wish them many happy years in Silver Spring, MD. I thank them for their loving, faithful service to the residents of the Washington metropolitan area.

TRIBUTE TO CONGRESSMAN HUGH ALEXANDER

HON. CHARLES ROSE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Congressman Hugh Q. Alexander who died on Sunday, September 17, 1989, in his hometown of Kannapolis, NC. Hugh was a tireless and dedicated public servant who is well remembered in Washington for his 10 years of service in the U.S. Congress and his long tenure as the chief counsel for the U.S. Senate Rules Committee. After his retirement from Washington in 1976, Hugh returned to North Carolina and continued his work as an outstanding community leader and philanthropist. His distinguished service as a lieutenant commander in the U.S. Navy made him a knowledgeable, active and strong advocate of veterans.

Although Hugh was a man of superlative character and deed, he was a very modest man. Hugh's warmth and intelligence endeared him to everyone that had the good fortune to meet him.

I very much admired Hugh and valued his friendship and advice over the years. He will be sorely missed by his family, his friends, and the State of North Carolina.

ANDY JESSUP NAMED BOY SCOUT MAN OF THE YEAR

HON. ALFRED A. (AL) McCANDLESS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. McCANDLESS. Mr. Speaker, a prominent resident of the 37th Congressional District, and longtime friend of mine, will be honored as the 1989 Boy Scout Man of the Year in Palm Springs, CA.

Andrew T. Jessup, Eagle Scout, Scout leader, devoted family man, and president of Plaza Motors, is the kind of person everyone wants to having living next door.

Andy always seems to have the time for whatever needs to be done in the community. He is the embodiment of the old saying, "When you want to get the job done, ask the busiest person you know to do it." As the past president of such outstanding organizations as the Palm Springs Kiwanis Club, the United Way of the Desert, the Palm Springs Chamber of Commerce, the Palm Springs Convention and Visitors Bureau, and the California Inland Empire Council of the Boy Scouts of America, Andy has had a positive impact on the lives of hundreds, and probably thousands of people. In his role as the past district chairman of the Palm Springs District of the Boy Scouts of America, Andy has been an outstanding role model for our young people, and he richly deserves this award.

I ask my colleagues to please join me in saluting Andrew T. Jessup, the 1989 Boy Scout Man of the Year, for a job well done. Congratulations, Andy.

WE SHOULD BE LISTENING TO CHINA'S EXILES

HON. JOE BARTON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues the following article, entitled "We Should Be Listening to China's Exiles," which appeared in the September 26, 1989, edition of the Washington Post. As champions of democracy in the world, we in America must realize how vital it is to support the democratic aspirations of the Chinese people. We have an obligation to provide moral and physical support whenever possible. Please read it.

WE SHOULD BE LISTENING TO CHINA'S EXILES

(By Jim Hoagland)

PARIS.—On the morning of June 4, 1989, Chen Yizi became a political orphan. Horrified by the massacre of civilians in Beijing's Tiananmen Square, a sobbing Chen sat down and wrote an angry letter of resignation from the Chinese Communist Party. He abandoned in bitter disillusionment a party and an ideology that had been at the center of his life for 30 years.

Friends talked Chen out of going to party headquarters to hand in the letter. He would meet arrest or worse, he was told. Instead, Chen fled, going into exile in Paris.

So did Wan Rannan, a party member for 24 years and China's most successful business executive. So did Su Xiaokang, a party member for two years and co-author of China's most celebrated television series, "The Yellow River." These three former Communists and more than 100 other prominent exiles gathered here in Paris this past weekend to organize a political opposition group to give form to their now amorphous yearnings for change in China.

Like Chen, many of these exiles were until June 4 leading figures in China's reform movement. Now they are described by Chinese government spokesmen as "poisonous weeds." They were "planted" in China by the United States as part of a conscious and ongoing plot to destroy China's Communist party, the Beijing media claims. These ludicrous accusations are directed against people who had believed until the last moment that it was possible to reform "their" party from the inside.

Talk to these exiles and you understand why the Beijing Communists tar them with the American brush. American values have played a positive role in shaping their views on democracy and economic freedoms. It is these values that threaten Prime Minister Li Peng and the old guard behind him, who seem to harbor a 1950's vintage Chinese hatred for America.

Why then did these exiles have their conference in France and not in the United States? Because, Chen and others tell me, the Bush administration is hesitant to deal with China's exile movement, showing concern instead about relations with Beijing's government.

While France was clearing away obstacles to the convening of this conference of dissidents, Bush's Commerce Department was receiving an official Chinese trade delegation. The decision surprised even the Chinese Embassy in Washington. It had predicted that U.S. anger over the Tiananmen Square killings would make it impossible for the delegation to be received.

This reversal of traditional priorities—the French showing concern for human rights in China, the Americans stubbornly keeping in touch with the Communist leadership—is not merely perverse. It is also self-defeating. Washington needs to hear what the exiles have to say and to ignore official rhetoric.

The Bush administration's wary attitude to the Chinese exiles resembles in some disturbing ways a reaction in the West to an earlier generation of political orphans; the intellectuals and politicians who fled Eastern Europe four decades ago to tell the West what they had learned about the nature of Stalinism.

But the European emigres were frequently treated as politically inconvenient. Apologists for Stalin and his successors said that the emigré activists had their own axes to grind, did not understand the realities of foreign affairs and the needs of world peace, or were simply agents for Washington's Cold Warriors. Today, it is the Gorbachev media that tell us how right the European emigrés were.

Today, it is the former Communists of China who risk becoming inconvenient to the Bush administration. Their ranks contain some of the leading reformers of the past decade. These disillusioned Communists know it is senseless to talk about resuming reforms under the present government while it is under the control of the Moscow-trained Li Peng.

The public statements of the Chinese rulers themselves demonstrate this reality. Deng's denunciation of the Polish Communist Party for sharing power with non-Communists is testimony to how shallow his commitment to reform is. His belated effort to promote the careers of relative "moderates" after the massacre is a sign of his instinctive distrust of all his subordinates. He is now trying to balance the power Li Peng has accumulated.

Or listen to Li Peng himself, who, in an interview in the Paris daily Le Figaro, recently showed why a policy of trying to placate Beijing by ignoring the dissidents will fail anyway:

"Someone who is very close to the president of the United States told me that the president is delighted that the American system can benefit from recruiting skilled people from among Chinese students" who will stay in exile, Li asserted. "The former American secretary of State, Foster Dulles, said . . . that three or four generations would be needed to produce a peaceful change in China. The United States has never abandoned that idea."

The subliminal suggestion that the president of the United States approves of stealing Chinese youth away from the homeland are the words of a man who harbors a long-burning hatred against an American establishment that fought China in Korea and Vietnam. He is not a reformer. Talks on trade and benign neglect of China's exile movement by Washington will not change that. Washington should not cling to illusions about what is happening in Beijing.

CHARLESTON VETERANS' HOSPITAL STAFF DISPLAYS COURAGE AND PROFESSIONALISM DURING HURRICANE HUGO

HON. G.V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to share with my colleagues a brief account of the courageous efforts of personnel at the Department of Veterans Affairs [DVA] Medical Center at Charleston, SC, which ensured the safety and proper care of its patients and contributed to the readiness of the community during Hurricane Hugo.

News photographs and television reports from Charleston have shown us in vivid detail the aftermath of the storm's ferocity, hints of the tremendous adversity faced by those who remained in the area and who continued to carry out their duties. In the face of this adversity, the DVA hospital staff did much more than simply function, they performed with an impressive measure of dedication and professionalism.

At 8 a.m., September 18, the Charleston veterans' hospital began preparing for Hurricane Hugo and, by day's end on September 21, windows had been boarded, the first floor had been cleared and all medical records had been moved in anticipation of flooding.

One hundred fourteen veteran patients were evacuated—61 to the veterans' hospital in Columbia, SC; 49 to the DVA hospital in Augusta, GA; and 4 to the Charleston Naval Hospital. Only 14 patients were considered by their physicians to be too sick to move.

Three hundred employees, family members of employees, and veterans were given shelter at the medical center.

The Charleston Coast Guard established its command post at the hospital when their facilities became flooded.

By 8 p.m. September 21, the winds and rain had intensified and were considered severe. At 11 p.m., windows on the hospital's fourth floor began to shatter and the walls began to buckle as the hurricane passed. The medical center staff sealed off the area to contain the damage. Fourth floor patients were moved to the operating room and recovery suites. County powerlines were downed, necessitating use of the hospital's emergency power generator.

At 1 a.m., after the eye of the hurricane had passed, windows on the opposite side of the facility blew out. Patients and family members were once again moved, this time to the center corridors of the building for protection. At 5 a.m., the facility lost its water pressure and continued to operate without water until September 23.

Shortly after daylight, officials conducted an assessment of damage to the facility. The roof had blown off of the engineering building. The group found considerable water damage in the facility's main building due to broken windows and a damaged roof.

Thankfully, due to the careful planning and vigilance of medical center employees, there were no casualties or injuries. Under humanitarian circumstances, the medical center has taken in two nonveteran patients from the community.

The hospital reports that its dietetic service continues to serve meals, electricity is functioning, and patients are being kept warm and dry.

Mr. Speaker, I know my colleagues will want to join with me in commending Charleston DVA Medical Center director, Michael M. Linder; acting associate director and disaster response coordinator, Robert Snow; staff assistant to the director, Robert Shimp; chief of staff, Robert A. Boudet; the service chiefs; and each of the hospital's employees for their heroism, humanity, and professionalism under very trying and dangerous circumstances. We should also thank employees from the DVA medical centers at Columbia, SC, and Augusta, GA, who are assisting the Charleston staff by helping repair structural damage and by providing clean water and supplies.

Well done, Charleston.

B'NAI B'RITH TO HONOR FORMER CONGRESSMAN BILL WHITEHURST

HON. OWEN B. PICKETT

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, October 18, the B'nai B'rith Foundation of the United States will present its Great American Traditions Award to former Congressman Bill Whitehurst.

This is a tremendous honor for Bill, and all of us from eastern Virginia are very proud of him. Recipients of this award are part of a select group of people who through their life's work serve as role models for young people.

Anyone who knows Bill Whitehurst, and most of us do, can understand why he is a natural choice for this award.

As a college professor, journalist, nine-term member of this House, and now professor and journalist again, Bill Whitehurst has always taken a special interest in young people and has been a role model for them.

Throughout his long House career, he was always available to speak to schools and colleges in the second district. Students enjoy Bill because he brings common sense, humor, and a wealth of practical experience to the study of American government. He also was extremely supportive of projects and activities involving young people. His support for ROTC programs and his efforts to showcase the accomplishments of particular cadets come immediately to mind.

B'nai B'rith has made a truly outstanding choice for the Great American Traditions Award. I know that my colleagues join me in wishing Bill and Janie all the best on this important occasion.

JAKE STOCK—STAR OF THE SHOW

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a very talented jazz musician, Mr. Jake Stock, who has entertained thousands during his career over half a century.

Starting his career in the early 1920's, Mr. Stock played the circuit at the height of the jazz period. He played with the Emerson Gill band in Cleveland, OH, from 1926 to 1927. Stock then went north to Canada to play with a number of musicians at a variety of clubs and radio stations before forming his own nine-piece band in Champlain, Canada. In 1935, Stock brought his band to California to play their first gig at Jack Moor's White Cap Cafe on Catalina Island. After marrying Grace Nelson in Long Beach, CA, the newlyweds moved to the Monterey Peninsula in 1937.

Perhaps one of the biggest highlights of Stock's career was opening the first Monterey Jazz Festival in 1957 with such jazz greats as Louie Armstrong, Dizzy Gillespie, and Lizzie Miles. The Monterey Jazz Festival has since gone on to become one of the most revered musical events in the world. Over the years, Jake Stock's Abalone Stompers played in nearly every club in the Monterey area. For 12 years Stock has played Fridays at the Catalyst in Santa Cruz and Sundays at the River Inn in Big Sur, also participating in the host of Dixie festivals throughout the State of California, including the Sacramento Dixieland Jubilee, Pismo Beach Mardi Gras, Los Angeles Classic, and, of course, the Monterey Dixie.

In 1978, Jake was honored by the City of Monterey's Pacheco and Paisano Clubs with a dinner coined Jake's Bake. Over 500 people packed into the warehouse on Cannery Row to honor this man who has spread so much happiness over the years. In 1982, Monterey's Parade of Nations named Jake the Citizen of the Year.

Mr. Speaker, Jake Stock has inspired and nourished hungry jazz enthusiasts with a talent and energy that are intense and timeless. I ask my colleagues to join me now in congratulating Jake Stock on his life's accomplishments.

SECTION 89: THE HOUSE FINALLY ACTS

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I discuss the passage yesterday of the Dorgan-Conte-Watkins amendment to repeal section 89 from the Tax Code and reiterate my strong support for that repeal effort and my affirmative vote on the repeal amendment.

Section 89 grew out of an idea for equity and eventually became a quagmire of confusing and expensive regulations that were impossible to interpret or follow. The Tax Reform Act of 1986 added section 89 "nondiscrimination" requirements to the Tax Code. Under these requirements, employers must prove that their plans do no unduly favor highly compensated employees. While well intentioned, the specifics of the law and its implementation cause burdens that are completely inconsistent with the goal. That is why section 89 has to be repealed: It makes no sense and costs everybody time and money.

I have been a proponent of repeal of section 89 from the moment it appeared before the Congress. I opposed the passage of the Tax Reform Act of 1986 on the grounds that there was too much in the bill that we in the Congress did not understand and would come to regret. But my constituents did. From the moment the IRS submitted regulations that were convoluted unintelligible—and they indicated that they doubted if they could improve upon them—I was besieged by calls and letters from the business, labor, and accounting professionals requesting, demanding, even pleading, for the Congress to solve their dilemma and repeal section 89.

Responding to their calls, I went to the Committee on Rules on May 24, 1989, asking them to allow the House of Representatives to vote on the repeal of section 89. Failing to get the approval of the Committee on Rules, I attempted a parliamentary move to allow the House a chance to vote on repeal. While that attempt lost by a mere seven votes, it focused the eyes of the Congress and the business community on the complete dissatisfaction with section 89 and the strength of the repeal effort. My next step was to introduce legislation, and file a discharge petition on May 31, 1989, to bring to the floor of the House a bill calling for the repeal of section 89.

The House was now on notice that the effort to repeal section 89 would be full throttle. On July 7, 1989 the House of Representatives passed a measure barring the Treasury Department from enforcing section 89 in fiscal year 1990; that measure, the Treasury, Postal Service, and General Government Appropriations Act, passed the Senate on August 4.

Which brings us to this day. After going before the Committee on Rules on behalf of the repeal amendment, I now express my extreme pleasure in voting for that repeal. Presuming similar Senate action and Presidential approval, we will soon put an end to a glorious concept that was never fully understood, thought out or properly delivered. Let us take this complete exercise as an educative example, a reminder that we in the Congress need to consider and reconsider again those concepts which sound too good and too simple to be true—and usually are.

REPRESENTATIVE FLIPPO INTRODUCES INTERSTATE LEGISLATION

HON. RONNIE G. FLIPPO

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Speaker, I am here today to introduce legislation that addresses a dire need in this country.

Inadequate transportation systems are stifling some of the Nation's most dynamic growth areas. Cities like Atlanta, GA; Memphis, TN, and Huntsville, AL, are stymied in a gridlock of deficient travel systems that hamper achievement of their economic potential.

The measure I am introducing today, the High-Technology Corridor Development Act of 1989, would remedy this grievous situation. It would add roughly 500 miles to the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways to link Memphis with Chattanooga and Atlanta.

It is important to remember that in the 1950's and 1960's when the Interstate System was developed, this Southeastern block was completely overlooked because, at that time, the population count did not merit an extensive surface transportation system.

Times certainly have changed. Atlanta now is the home of one of the largest airports in the world and has become a Southern center of commerce. Huntsville, AL, is the headquarters of the Army Missile Command and home of NASA's Marshall Space Flight Center and Memphis, TN, has become a hub for business enterprise. The population in this block of Southeastern States has surged in the last two decades and the passage from Huntsville to Iuka, Mississippi has become a high-technology corridor, yet there is no east-west interstate highway accessible within 100 miles or more.

Undeniably, surface transportation routes in this region are sadly lacking. The bill I am introducing would ensure a gravely needed improvement over the present circuitous, congested and hazardous routes.

This new segment of interstate highway would simply extend the current east-west Interstate System. The addition is a natural expansion of the world's safest and most efficient highway network. It will transverse one of the fastest growing regions of the country, but a region that includes some of the most economically depressed pockets of the Nation.

This extension of the interstate is not just a boon for the South. It will facilitate domestic trade and make southern growth centers more accessible for the rest of the country, providing a solid foundation for future growth in commerce.

In this age of global economy and international competition we cannot afford to repress promising cities like Atlanta, Memphis, Chattanooga, and Huntsville.

The lock on interstate mileage since 1969, has held these cities hostage for two decades. It is high time we set them free. I hope that the Public Works Committee will bear this in mind as it begins deliberation on the future direction of the Federal highway programs.

INTRODUCTION OF THE LEGISLATION TO PREVENT THE DUMPING OF HUMAN WASTE BY AMTRAK

HON. GERRY SIKORSKI

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. SIKORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today to bring the National Railroad Passenger Corporation—Amtrak—into the 20th century, at least their toilets. This short and simple bill requires that Amtrak halt a practice that would have Americans—if they knew—storming their local depots to demand reform: The routine dumping of human waste directly on railroad tracks. Amtrak is the only railroad in this country that persists in this foul habit, and it's time it stopped.

For decades now, the technology has existed for railroads to store and safely and sanitarily dispose of human waste. This is nothing more than what is required of every vehicle in every mode of transportation in America—except Amtrak. Amtrak's policy is simply to macerate—or grind—human waste and spray it directly, untreated, on the tracks, the railroad workers, and the kids in our backyards, and communities.

If you were to pull up to a railroad crossing in an R.V. and do what Amtrak does routinely, you would rightly be arrested on a host of public health violations and public nuisance charges. But Amtrak does it day in and day out.

Amtrak's license exists as the result of a special law which explicitly exempted that railroad from health and hygiene practices mandated of all other railroads. Today Amtrak officials cite a 1978 Department of Health and Human Services study which found no "identifiable disease outbreaks"—but this is anything but a clean bill of health. Scientists, public health officials, doctors, and ordinary citizens, even grade schoolers, know that the practice of transcontinental dumping of human waste puts our families and our children at risk of cholera, dysentery, infectious hepatitis, and any number of other parasitic and communicable diseases. It is a medieval practice which must end.

Amtrak dumps directly on our communities: On the backyards of America where our children play, on the tracks where hikers walk and most immediately, on maintenance of way employees who repair and maintain the tracks and often have no place to go when a liner comes by and sprays them with a fine mist.

Over 10 States, when informed of Amtrak's policy, have written that it is in violation of their public health statutes and entreated Amtrak to desist. Amtrak has been hauled into courts across the country: By the State of Florida, for dumping human waste directly into rivers and waterways and on an elderly couple fishing; by public health officials in Montana; by maintenance of way workers who were dumped on in Oregon; in Washington, Utah, California, and Nevada. As an editorial in the Portland Oregonian notes, "Amtrak has no business flushing its toilets onto tracks, rivers and, sometimes, workers and fishermen below the tracks."

Nevertheless, Amtrak persists, citing the 1976 congressional exemption as justification for this heinous practice. Today I call on Congress to "Just Say No." Support this legislation to end this foul practice once and for all.

JOANNE PUGLISI CHRISINGER: 16 YEARS OF SERVICE TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to pay a special tribute to Ms. Joanne Louise Puglisi Chrisinger who leaves the House of Representatives today to begin another career.

Joanne first came to this body in 1973, when she began working in the office of Congressman George E. Shipley of Illinois. Previously, she had worked at the Bureau of the Census, and before that at the National Association of Letter Carriers. In 1979, Joanne came to work as my personal secretary and scheduler. I cannot speak highly enough of her commitment to her job, to the people of the Second Congressional District of New York, and to the House of Representatives.

A native Washingtonian, Joanne typifies the many dedicated staff members who make the House a special place, a small town really, where everyone helps a neighbor, where good turns are not forgotten, and where people care about each other.

So often, Mr. Speaker, the spotlight falls on the Members and the House. But we stand in the spotlight because we stand on the shoulders of staff. We keep impossible schedules because there are people like Joanne who devise ingenious ways to get us to two places at once. This body would be far less effective if the people who generally remain nameless were not willing to devote their energy and talents, their good humor and common sense, their sense of what is right and wrong to make this House the greatest legislature in the world.

I will miss Joanne as will the other members of my staff and all the constituents who have come to know her over the past 10 years. The work of the House goes on and there will be others who share the same belief in our political system, who are excited about working here, who don't care about the long hours, and who are proud of the chance to serve the House and the American public. Joanne Puglisi Chrisinger joins the thousands upon thousands of staff who have left the House a richer, more humane place. I am proud to call myself her friend and I am grateful, Mr. Speaker, to have this opportunity to give her this well-deserved public recognition.

EGGERS, AN EXCELLENT SCHOOL

HON. PETER J. VISCLOSKY

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. VISCLOSKY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the representatives of Henry Eggers Middle School of Hammond, IN, who have come to Washington today to accept an award from the Department of Education which recognizes the school as a school of excellence.

The Schools of Excellence Program honors institutions that demonstrate extraordinary community involvement, innovation and attention to the learning environment they create. Each year, 218 schools are chosen as examples of outstanding dedication to the development of our youth. This year, Eggers Middle School has been named to the ranks of the Nation's finest secondary schools.

A successful school needs dedicated administrators, caring teachers, and committed parents. The Hammond School District is a pioneer in returning responsibility to parents. Mrs. Chris Fladeland is here as a representative of the Eggers parent council which has proven that experiment successful. The parents of Eggers regard the success of their school as a personal duty. Their involvement is the foundation of the solid education Eggers provides.

Middle schools have a special clientele, children who have passed the elementary stage where a close relationship with a single teacher is necessary, yet are not ready to study subjects in departments as high school students do. Recognizing that difference, Eggers has developed a team-teaching system, in which groups of teachers work closely with each other to meet the special needs of students grouped by learning level and not by age. Counselor Joyce Irminger reflects the commitment and the care which the Eggers' faculty gives to individual students in creating this innovative educational environment.

There is a certain elan a visitor can sense just in walking the halls of an excellent school—an audible murmur that the visitor recognizes as learning. We must credit Dr. Jane Kendrick, because as principal, she has made sure that the murmur is audible above the din that students sometimes raise. When every teacher knows the students coming into the classroom have just left a learning environment in the room next door, that certain knowledge makes the day's lesson much easier to impart. Dr. Kendrick gives her teachers that security.

I am sure that these educators and the schools they represent are proud of their achievement and excited at this opportunity to meet and share their wisdom with the most successful educators of the country. Eggers School has given Hammond, and indeed our Nation, a reason to look to its future with confidence and pride.

SUPPORT THE RURAL REVITALIZATION ACT

HON. MIKE ESPY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. ESPY. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman from South Carolina for his initiative in introducing the Rural Revitalization Act, and I am proud to be an original cosponsor of this legislation.

The need for this legislation is urgent. What could be more urgent than employment rates in the high teens, even higher for minorities? What could be more urgent than per capita income of less than $10,000? In my district, 154,000 people still make about $5,000 a year in 1989. What could be more urgent than illiteracy rates and infant mortality rates compared to Third World countries? In my district, out of every 1,000 babies born, 16 of them will not live to blow out the candles on their first birthday.

So the issue before us today is not whether to throw more Federal money at a problem; rather, it is how to use our money more effectively and how to combine the private and public sector communities into a solid partnership targeted to rural America. This legislation that we are discussing today addresses some of the important initiatives we need to undertake in order to ignite the economic recovery of our rural areas. The amounts of money proposed is modest by just about anyone's standards, and the design of this legislation is to make these modest sums work to generate jobs and economic activity and tax revenues in rural America.

I would like to address one component of this legislation, the $300 million revolving loan fund that will be available through nonprofit entities, rural electric and investor-owned utilities, and others. This fund would be available for 3 years, and would involve working with local entities that are in place and doing business in rural America. These entities know how to take these Federal funds and put it with local and State money, private capital, and other moneys.

Mr. Speaker, I represent an area known as the Mississippi Delta. This area has some of the richest, most fertile agricultural land in the world. Farm-raised catfish is an increasingly important agriculture product in my district which provides a large employment base. My district could face what a lot of other rural areas are facing. Without functional infrastructure, and what I mean by that is water and wastewater treatment, we could face the possibility that our product would be grown in my district and processed somewhere else. This is not the case now, and I hope it never will be.

This bill we are discussing here today provides for some sensible, inexpensive ways for rural areas to begin the process of building those critical water and wastewater treatment plants. It provides for the kind of technical advice and support that will help our rural communities develop systems that make sense now and in the future.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I am honored to be able to speak in support of this legislation and am honored to be an original cosponsor. I commend the gentleman from South Carolina for his initiatives.

HONORING COUNCILMAN JOHN SUTTON

HON. GARY A. CONDIT

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. CONDIT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor a distinguished public servant from my district, Mr. John Sutton, and his wife Donna Sutton, who were tragically killed yesterday when the sightseeing aircraft they were riding in crashed over the Grand Canyon National Park.

Mr. Sutton was a distinguished community leader and city councilman in Modesto, CA. He was active in several community pursuits including Scouting, PTA, and the Modesto YMCA. He once said, "Some people play golf. Some men hunt and fish. I get a lot of satisfaction in being with people. To me it's a hobby like others have their sports."

A World War II veteran, Mr. Sutton served his country in the South Pacific aboard a destroyer. He was active in his church and a respected member of the Modesto business community.

Mrs. Sutton was very involved in community affairs in her own right. She was active in the local symphony guild, the Townsend Opera Players, the Women's Refuge Center, ecology groups, and the PTA.

Mr. Speaker, my district has lost two fine citizens. We grieve the loss and send our deepest condolences to the Sutton family and their many friends.

FEDERAL DRUG SECURITY SURCHARGE

HON. JOHN J. DUNCAN, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, I have received a copy of a letter from one of my constituents, Dr. Edward Tauxe of Knoxville, TN, to the Director of National Drug Control Policy, William Bennett.

Dr. Tauxe proposes a Federal security surcharge on the filing of all income tax forms. This revenue would go to fund our national war on drugs. Additionally, he suggests a system for better management of handling drug dependent persons.

I commend this thoughtful and insightful letter to my colleagues in the House, and I would like to submit it to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I believe that all Members would gain insight from reading this letter.

KNOXVILLE, TN, September 7, 1989.

Mr. WILLIAM BENNETT,

Director of Office of National Drug Control Policy, Office of Secretary of Education, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: I congratulate you on your new comprehensive program to attack the drug problem in the country. I am indeed grateful to President Bush for his support in purposing this and for his timely speech introducing this to the nation.

I will be sending a copy of this letter to my Senators and friends in the House of Representatives in the hopes of strong bipartisan support for a terrible non-partisan problem. As you know partisan politics can certainly stifle this program. We have to guard against that. It would be rare indeed for the bill to go unamended and if the political powers that be are indeed able to give useful amendments; then I think this may be useful in helping make this a bipartisan bill.

The purpose of this letter is to propose a couple of considerations that I would hope may improve the bill. As you know, the Democratic leadership seems to be saying, it does not go far enough. I am sure that all Democrats and Republicans in our national leadership would like for it to go further, but, we must start somewhere. It is obviously the will of the nation that we do not increase taxes. I do see a way, however, that some partial funding can be made if the President will agree not to veto and if the Democrat leadership agree not to attempt to capitalize on the idea of tax increase, and if the bipartisan leadership would agree such that the vote would be so dramatic the President would be unable to veto a bit of extra funding. I am proposing a surcharge for every household in the country who files income tax forms. I would propose that every household be given a $20.00 (plus or minus) federal drug security surcharge. As you have brought out, this is a multi-factorial problem. The grower, the manufacturer, the importer, the pusher and the user, as well as the person who is aware of this going on and does nothing to stop it.

We talk about disincentives and this is true. The average citizen, however, is not getting a direct disincentive, that I really see, that would be interpreted as such in the present bill proposed.

I do not see the average citizen really doing anything, except perhaps small talk. If we are not a part of the solution, we are a part of the problem.

A federal security surcharge, however, would be a direct disincentive and coupled with "hot lines" can certainly encourage the citizenry to do more toward being a part of the solution to the problem.

As you know, the problem has been with us for many scores of years and will always be a problem as a result of the drug dependent personalities, etc., with which we are born. The problem becomes one of management. When I began to practice medicine, back in early 1952. We had a system of federal hospitals. When our doctors found a person abusing drugs, they were simply reported to federal authorities, and in our area they would be taken to the hospital in Lexington, Kentucky. There they may go voluntarily or involuntarily for a "cure". This really worked quite well. While there were a large number of failures, the problem was indeed managed relatively well; realizing the problem can never be totally gone. I would suggest looking into this system of federal hospitals that were "on the line" back in those days.

I am sure there will be many other considerations and possible amendments. I think this should be encouraged so the final bill will still have the appropriate direction yet, the support of both parties and hopefully a 100% vote in both Houses to support the final bill.

I want to emphasize a surcharge would not be a new tax and should not be construed as a new tax. While incomes of a certain level, perhaps could be "excused" from such a surcharge. It is important, in my mind, that this be a surcharge paid equally by everyone, that it be coupled with a possible means of everyone being able to report, and to be encouraged to report drug offenders and possible verbal supportive criticism to improve the problem and that the surcharge vary from year to year according to the necessity for over and above normal law enforcement. Also, that it have an end point, such as five years.

With kindest personal regards and sincere good wishes.

Yours very truly,

EDWARD L. TAUXE, M.D.

THE FEDERAL ASSISTANCE PROCEDURES REFORM ACT

HON. MARGE ROUKEMA

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, over the last several months all of us have been dismayed by the revelations of scandal coming out of the Department of Housing and Urban Development. As the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Housing and Community Development, I have been particularly appalled at the abuses which occurred and the neglectful attitude which was pervasive throughout the top management of the Department.

Our own Housing Subcommittee of the Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee has looked into the scandal. In addition, the Subcommittee on Employment and Housing, chaired by the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. LANTOS], has conducted a superb series of hearings which has produced extensive information which has been both relevant and disturbing. I have attended many of those hearings and can attest to the completely professional, nonpartisan methodology the committee has used in uncovering this mushrooming scandal.

Just this week we witnessed the unfortunate spectacle of former Secretary Pierce and the man who was his chief assistant refusing to answer questions from a congressional committee and invoking their fifth amendment privileges. This just underscores the seriousness of this matter and the complexity of the investigation.

Today, I am introducing legislation to address some of the abuses which have come to light. This bill is not an attempt to implement sweeping programatic changes at HUD.

That will wait until the Housing Subcommittees of the House and Senate write a comprehensive housing bill. Rather, this legislation is a commonsense measure designed to close the loopholes and systemic abuses that have been uncovered at HUD to date. However, before I explain the provisions of my proposal, I want to comment on what led us to this situation.

Clearly, new legislation is needed, but a legislative response cannot hope to solve all the problems we have discovered. Many of those problems had less to do with program structure than with the attitude of those who ran the Department.

Obviously, the programs at HUD were the lowest priorities of the last administration. Many of the people appointed to serve in the Department either lacked experience in housing or were antagonistic toward the programs or both. In that atmosphere, morale among career employees plummeted, and many of the best employees retired or transferred to other agencies. When a Department's top managers are hostile toward the Department's mission, it is not surprising to find poor oversight and abuses in programs. To a large degree, we must rely on the faithful and professional management of the department. Legislation cannot solve such management problems. One of the lessons of the current scandal is that lack of sufficient oversight by the administration and the Congress is likely to lead to trouble.

Having said that, I do think that certain immediate legislative changes are appropriate. The bill which I have introduced today addresses several different problems.

It would require public disclosure whenever any applicant for Federal funds hired a consultant to contact any Department or Agency. It would require the name and address of the consultant to be reported, as well as the amount of the fee and the activities for which the payment is made. Had such disclosure requirements been in place over the last several years, I do not think we would have seen incidents where a well-connected consultant could make hundreds of thousands of dollars for making a couple of phone calls.

This proposal would also create a new position at HUD of Chief Financial Officer and Under Secretary for Management. The position would be filled by a nonpartisan Presidential appointee who would be accountable, by law, to the Secretary for HUD's management systems and general management functions. This position is styled to a degree after the Inspector General Act of 1978, which requires notifying both Houses of Congress of the reason for removal.

This new position was recommended by the General Accounting Office in a report it issued in 1984. That report said, in part:

GAO recognizes that a nonpartisan (financial and management officer) may be a departure from our traditional political system. However, this option is particularly attractive because it can professionalize and enhance HUD's managerial leadership and provide a benchmark for the Congress to use when considering ways to improve management in other Federal agencies.

Quite simply, this new Chief Financial Officer would serve as HUD's official "watchdog." The person filling this position would oversee all revenue—incoming and outgoing—to ensure its proper handling and disposition. In this way, we hope to prevent a recurrence of such disturbing episodes as the recent problems in the HUD coinsurance program and the FHA deficits.

The bill would also prohibit fee arrangements which are tied either to the number of housing units or to success in obtaining a grant. This provision would apply only to HUD. Further, it would require proper advertising whenever HUD benefits are available and consultation with localities before the awarding of any units. In the Coinsurance Program, this legislation would require the lender to cover all of any loss which is the result of fraud by any party. Under current law, the lender is liable only if the lender engages in fraud.

This legislation would require the Secretary of any Department to issue an "accountability report" whenever he is given a report with recommendations by his inspector general. In that "accountability report" the Secretary would have to list for the Congress which recommendations were being rejected, which accepted, and why. He would also have to lay out a time line for the actions he intended to take so that the Congress would have a standard by which to judge progress. This is very similar to a current requirement when GAO makes recommendations.

Finally, the proposal would make certain changes in the authority given inspectors general throughout the Government. They must have the tools and the teeth to operate as independent and aggressive "whistleblowers."

This legislation would give inspectors general's subpoena power to compel testimony. At present, they have such power only to compel collection of documents.

Current law requires an inspector general to bring to the Secretary's attention any serious matter he discovers, the report on which the Secretary is required to forward to the appropriate committees of the Congress within 7 days. My bill would require the inspectors general to forward that information directly to the Congress should the Secretary fail to act during the 7 days. The legislation would also give inspectors general a fixed term of 10 years with the option of reappointment at the end of that term. This is designed to increase the independence of the inspectors general's.

The disclosure provisions of my bill are, in many ways, similar to those already contained in the Senate version of the Interior appropriations bill and in H.R. 3136, which was introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. LANTOS] and which I cosponsored. I do think that my bill provides a simpler, cleaner approach to disclosure than those other proposals, but I am certainly willing to work with other Members to fashion a final version on which we can all agree.

Secretary Jack Kemp inherited more problems than any of us could have guessed at the time of his appointment. To his great credit, he has met these challenges head on, and, at the same time, has pushed to move his Department in new and productive directions. I know that Secretary Kemp is working on a package of reforms which is likely to be ready in the next few weeks. Certainly, the other leaders of the Housing Subcommittee and I will be working with the administration to try to fashion a bipartisan, consensus bill, which may incorporate features from several different proposals. I have every hope that we can achieve such a common purpose in short order.

In the meantime, I hope introduction of this legislation today will help move us along toward that end.

STATEMENT ON CAPITAL GAINS VOTE

HON. BILL EMERSON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I don't believe we should have to choose between either the benefits of capital gains on the one hand or the benefits of IRA deductions on the other. Rather, I believe that by enacting both of these proposals, we can achieve the best formula to stimulate our economy and to help the middle-income Americans make the most of the money they have.

First of all, I voted to reduce the capital gains tax for all Americans. Contrary to what some folks say, this reduction is not a reduction for the rich. As a matter of fact, a recent U.S. Treasury analysis verifies that 75 percent of the taxpayers who show capital gains on their tax returns have other incomes of less than $50,000—with almost 17 percent reporting less than $10,000 in wages and salary.

And, while the majority Leadership claims that the capital gains tax reduction is a plan for the wealthy while their plan is a proposal that will benefit the working class, the facts indicate otherwise. The Treasury analysis also shows that the vast bulk of the beneficiaries of the Democratic proposal would be those with income over $50,000—in fact, almost 84 percent. The simple reason for this is that most taxpayers with incomes under that level already qualify for IRA's.

I, too, have cosponsored legislation to allow folks to tap into their IRA's for down payments on their first homes, for education purposes, and for emergency medical expenses. This current proposal, on the other hand, would have restored only 50 percent of the deduction for IRA's. Under present law, families with incomes under $40,000 can already deduct 100 percent of their IRA contributions. These are the folks who wouldn't be helped at all by the Democratic leadership's IRA proposal, but who would stand to benefit by the capital gains reduction.

THE 100TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE CHRISTIAN STREET BRANCH OF THE YMCA OF PHILADELPHIA AND VICINITY

HON. THOMAS M. FOGLIETTA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to salute the Christian Street Branch of the YMCA of Philadelphia and vicinity. One hundred years ago, the Christian Street YMCA was built to provide a social and sports facility for Afro-American youth. Since then, the Christian Street YMCA has served Philadelphians of all races.

Today, this fine institution wishes to reaffirm its commitment of service and leadership to the city of Philadelphia. The Christian Street YMCA has long sought to develop the mind, body, and spirit of those who entered its doors. The Christian Street YMCA pledges to continue this tradition for the next 100 years.

I commend the individuals who built the Christian Street YMCA and maintain its strong tradition. I wish them a happy and healthy 100th anniversary.

CAPITAL GAINS

HON. AMO HOUGHTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. HOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I voted against the Rostenkowski-Gephardt amendment. I don't like it, and frankly I don't like its alternatives. I wish the bill were crafted differently, but it isn't. The sad part is that these are very important issues to which we are giving the back of our hand.

I believe in dramatically lower capital gains taxes. They are outdated. Our major competitors on the world state have virtually no such tax. But what sort of yo-yo plan is this, whereby the program presented to us for an up or down vote applies for only 2½ years and in the long term loses revenue?

I also believe in increased savings. This is probably as important a subject as we can attack. But the IRA provision here doesn't help at all the working families earning less than $50,000 a year. What sort of a plan is that?

There is still another problem, maybe the most important of all. This amendment shoots holes through the 1986 Tax Act as well as the budget. The 1986 Tax Act, frankly, wasn't much—mainly because it was revenue neutral. It didn't fix our financial plight. But it is a relatively predictable law which has a philosophy. Namely, to eliminate gimmicks and loopholes in return for lower overall rates. Now this all starts to unravel. And as far as the budget deficit is concerned, aside from a questionable tax increase, we lose even more money in our national operating budget.

This is bad legislation.

It's bad economics.

I voted against it.

TRIBUTE TO MAURICIO ARENZON

HON. JIM MOODY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to honor Mr. Mauricio Arenzon, president of Wisconsin Knitting Co., who was recently named the SBA Minority Small Business Person of the Year.

As president of Wisconsin Knitting Co., Mr. Arenzon provides the leadership and guidance which has resulted in an impressive growth in sales and profits over the last 4 years. This firm, which manufactures textile mill products and apparel, has grown from a modest 3-employee business in 1979, to a company which employs 94 people and can compete successfully in the private sector as well as providing quality products for our Department of Defense.

Wisconsin Knitting Co. employs minority and handicapped individuals in a variety of positions in labor, office, and management departments. The company promotes from within and encourages personal growth and responsibility in all its employees. It has received official recognition by the city of Milwaukee for its development efforts, as well as recognition by Milwaukee County for its continued support of low-income and minority employment programs.

Mr. Arenzon has instilled in the company the same values and ideals that have made him so successful. Wisconsin Knitting has played an increasing role in improving the lives of the citizens of Milwaukee by supporting numerous charitable organizations and providing many people with their greatest dignity, the means to support themselves.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the Small Business Administration has recognized the contributions of Mauricio Arenzon by awarding him this most deserved honor.

CONNIE CHIMPKY, HAYWARD, CA, 1989 FINALIST OF JAMES CASH PENNEY AWARD FOR COMMUNITY SERVICE

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, if anyone ever doubts whether a single individual can make a difference, they should take a look at Connie Chimpky.

Ms. Chimpky, a collector with J.C. Penney's credit service center in Fremont, CA, and one of a handful honored September 14 as a finalist for the 1989 James Cash Penney Award for Community Service, has made a difference; a heartfelt, communityfelt difference.

It started with her job. In handling a delinquent account, she learned the individual was disabled with a family, which included four young children and a wife who was employed part time. And with that, Ms. Chimpky turned the challenge of her daily job into a call to service to the needy of her community. She reached out a helping hand to that family and helped provide the food they desperately needed. Soon, she and her friends were helping not one but eight needy families.

That proved to be only the beginning of Connie's service to her community. She went on to help organize and put up fences at an El Zocalo shelter for women and children and energetically spearheaded drives for food and clothing for the homeless.

In recommending Ms. Chimpky for the James Cash Penney award, the executive director of El Zocalo Shelters, Inc., said; "If I could only clone Ms. Chimpky we would be able to get a lot more done at one time, since she is such an excellent volunteer."

Ms. Chimpky well deserves the special honor that has been bestowed upon her and it is a privilege for me to join JCPenney in recognizing the contribution she has made to our community. We thank you, Connie, for your exemplary voluntarism. We wish there were more like you.

COWBELLES CELEBRATE 50TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. JIM KOLBE

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. KOLBE. Mr. Speaker, it is with great honor and enthusiasm that I rise today to give tribute to the Cowbelles of Douglas, AZ. Founders of the Arizona State Cowbelles and the National Cattlewomen organizations, the Cowbelles of Douglas, AZ are celebrating their 50th anniversary on Tuesday, October 17, 1989. This occasion gives me the opportunity to voice my admiration for this worthwhile organization.

At the suggestion of Mrs. Will Glen, on October 17, 1939, 16 women gathered in the home of Mrs. Ralph Cowan in order to plan meetings and dances for the local cattle people. They formalized their association with the election of Mrs. Cowan as president. This marked the beginning of the Cowbelles and a tradition of charity and promotion of the cattle industry.

While the purpose of the organization was initially to encourage goodwill and friendship among the wives of the cattlemen of Cochise County, AZ, the women quickly became involved in devoting their time to charitable endeavors. They made generous contributions to the Arizona Boys Ranch and the Arizona Children's Home for which they also made afghans and quilts.

The news of this unique organization soon spread to neighboring communities. Wilcox, Santa Cruz, and Greenlee Counties, among others, joined Cochise County by forming their own local chapters. In 1947, the Arizona State Cowbelles came into being. Shortly thereafter, in 1952, nationwide interest prompted the formation of the American National Cow Belles.

Since its inception, the American National Cow Belles has grown to almost 7,000 members in 30 States. One of the 25 State organizations, Arizona boasts 300 members at the State level and nearly 700 members at the local level. In cooperation, these dedicated women work hand in hand with the cattlemen's organization, the Beef Council and National Livestock and Meat Board in the promotion of beef and other projects for the betterment of the cattle industry. My mother, Helen Kolbe, was a member of the Sonoita-Elgin Cowbelles for many years, so I know first hand of the good work this group does to promote our Arizona cattle industry.

That small group of women that met in 1939 never imagined that their organization would meet with such success. Through commitment and competent leadership, the Cowbelles of Douglas, AZ have not only positively affected their community and Arizona, but also one of our country's oldest and most important industries. I extend my sincere appreciation and congratulations to the Cowbelles.

INTRODUCTION OF A BILL SUPPORTING THE TARAWA DECLARATION'S CALL FOR ESTABLISHING A DRIFT NET FREE ZONE IN THE SOUTH PACIFIC

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, in July of this year, 15 nations of the South Pacific issued the Tarawa Declaration, to urge the international community to support and cooperate in the negotiation of a regional convention to establish a drift net free zone in the South Pacific region. The magnitude of the threat of these nets to the South Pacific countries is without parallel in the United States.

The income from tuna caught within the islands' 200-mile extended economic zones often represents up to 10 or 20 percent of the annual budgets of some of the island states. Their government operational funding and the very vitality of their economies are inextricably tied to the islands' marine resources.

The United States has seen the continued existence of certain domestic fish species, such as salmon, threatened in the past by drift net fishing. The actual cost of the potential loss of the salmon industry in the United States would be enormous. Congress recognized the gravity of the use of drift net fishing for salmon in the North Pacific and enacted the Drift net Impact Monitoring, Assessment, and Control Act of 1987.

Although of significant environmental value as well, the total potential dollar loss of salmon represents a small fraction of the annual budget of the United States, less than 1 percent. However, tuna is a primary resource of many of the South Pacific countries with devastating consequences if lost.

Drift nets are plastic nets up to 20 or 30 miles long. They have been referred to as the wall of death by some due to the indiscriminate trapping of all species of fish, including mammals such as porpoise, dolphin, seals, and whales. The impact of the drift net on the tuna stocks can be tremendous as the drift nets float vertically at the top of the ocean where the younger fish swim. The mature tuna generally migrate at much lower depths. Therefore, the drift nets are eliminating future generations of tuna. Eventually there would be no significant number of adults to regenerate the population. It is as conceivable that the tuna could become extinct as the millions of buffalo almost did in the United States due to uncontrolled killing.

The nations of the South Pacific met in July 1989, in Tarawa, the capital of the island nation of Kiribati, whose numerous small islands are scattered across an area of the Pacific Ocean larger than that of the continental United States. They met to discuss issues of mutual concern and formulate a consensus of what action should be taken.

They agreed that prompt action needed to be taken to eliminate the use of driftnet fishing in the South Pacific. Their concerns were enunciated in a document which was signed by 15 nations and which is known as the Tarawa Declaration.

I am introducing a bill today in support of the unified stance of the Pacific nations for the negotiation of a regional convention to establish a driftnet free zone in the South Pacific. The Congress recognized the wicked effect of these nets in the North Pacific, and surely the impact is equally severe in the South Pacific.

The bill is as follows:

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds that—

(1) In July, 1989, the South Pacific Forum issued the Tarawa Declaration, which calls on the international community to support and cooperate in the negotiation of a regional convention to establish a drift net free zone in the South Pacific region.

(2) Pending the negotiation of such a convention, the Tarawa Declaration calls for the immediate cessation of drift net fishing in the region by the Japanese and Taiwanese vessels.

SEC. 2. POLICY.

It is the sense of Congress that the policy of the United States should be to achieve international agreement on banning large-scale driftnet fishing on the high seas as soon as possible including by supporting the Tarawa Declaration and other international efforts to achieve such a ban.

The Tarawa Declaration referenced in the resolution expresses the concerns of the nations of the South Pacific regarding driftnet fishing. Several countries are cited regarding their involvement in driftnet fishing. Korea is commended for its decision to cease driftnet fishing in the region. However, Japan and Taiwan are called upon to immediately cease their damaging drift net operations. The following is the Tarawa Declaration in full:

TWENTIETH SOUTH PACIFIC FORUM TARAWA DECLARATION

TARAWA DECLARATION

The South Pacific Forum meeting at Tarawa on 10-11 July 1989.

Recognising the crucial dependence of the Pacific Island peoples on marine resources;

Profoundly concerned at the damage now being done by pelagic drift net fishing to the economy and environment of the South Pacific region;

Convinced that this indiscriminate, irresponsible and destructive fishing technique threatens the survival of the Albacore tuna resource, and so the economic well-being of forum island countries;

Deeply regretting that Japan and Taiwan have failed to respond to the concerns of regional countries about the most serious issue;

Noting that it is in the mutual interest of the major fishing nations active in the region, and the forum, to conserve fisheries stocks;

Noting that all countries inside and outside the region are affected by the mismanagement of the resources of the world's oceans, by the environmental dangers of drift net fishing and by the threat to safe navigation;

Recalling the relevant provisions of the 1982 United Nations Convention of the Law of the Sea, and in particular articles 63, 64, 87, 116, 117, 118, and 119;

Recognising that the use of drift nets as presently employed in the Southern Pacific Albacore Tuna Fishery is not consistent with international legal requirements in relation to rights and obligations of high seas fisheries conservation and management and environmental principles;

Resolves for the sake of this and succeeding generations of Pacific peoples to seek the establishment of a regime for the management of Albacore Tuna in the South Pacific that would ban drift net fishing from the region: Such a ban might then be a first step to a comprehensive ban on such fishing;

Determines, to this end, to convene an urgent meeting of regional diplomatic, legal and fisheries experts to develop a convention to give effect to its common resolve to create a zone free of drift net fishing;

Resolves that individual member states of the South Pacific Forum will take all possible measures in the interim to prevent drift net fishing within their waters, and otherwise actively to discourage the operations of drift net fishers;

Further resolves that member states acting individually and collectively will take what action they can within relevant international organisation to contribute to the cessation of this harmful form of fishing;

Commends the Republic of Korea for its decision to cease drift net fishing in the region; and Calls on Japan and Taiwan to follow this example, and abandon immediately their damaging drift net operations.

All countries of the Pacific Basin, including the United States, are members of what one Pacific Island Ambassador called the aquatic continent of the Pacific. We must work together to preserve the fragile environment both on land and above and below the ocean surface. The international community's support of a regional convention to establish a driftnet free zone in the South Pacific would represent a major marine ecological achievement. I urge my colleagues to join in support of our aquatic environment through the elimination of the monster drift nets.

NATIONAL SCHOOLS OF RECOGNITION AWARDS

HON. JACK BUECHNER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. BUECHNER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to call attention to three schools in my district, and one right next door, who will be receiving the National School of Recognition award from the President of the United States: Brentwood Middle School in Brentwood, MO; Parkway Central Junior High School in Chesterfield, MO; Ursuline Academy in Oakland, MO; and Cross Keys Middle School, in Florissant, MO which is attended by young people from my district.

At a time in our history when many are examining the basic precepts which govern our educational system we can learn by the example that these schools have set. Others may settle for mediocrity but these schools have committed themselves to no less than excellence. While many of our Nation's schools seem to be in decline, these schools remain robust. And while many question what constitutes a viable educational standard, these schools have not only shown they know, but by their outstanding efforts have pushed the standard even higher.

The National School of Recognition Awards are given to individual schools, but it is not a building or a place to which they will be given. Although a school may be located in a building, it is more than the roof and walls which define its physical location. Rather, this award will be given to honor the manifestation of a commitment by concerned individuals dedicated to an educational ideal. This commitment is exemplified by the principal and administrators who work to provide the structural decisionmaking framework to form a cohesive system, but perhaps equally so by the custodians who maintain clean, well-lighted classrooms, or cafeteria workers who serve nutritious meals each day.

It is a collective effort, the product of the hard work of concerned teachers trying to ignite the spark of learning in a young mind—as well as of the hard work and acceptance by that young mind of the gift that is being conferred. It is by the dedication of the community—both parents and other concerned individuals alike—who understand that the educational costs today are an investment in the future for all of us.

In a day and age when many judge our educational system by what is wrong, I submit that perhaps a more appropriate measure would be to look at what is right. In this we need look no farther than the example set by these schools. They have demonstrated that the most important criteria for achieving excellence is by refusing to accept no less.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud of these schools and I ask each of my colleagues to join me in saluting their accomplishments. To the administrators, teachers, faculty, staff, students, parents and communities in which these schools are located, we extend our heartfelt congratulations.

H.R. 3383, TO AUTHORIZE THE NATIONAL PARK SERVICE TO CONDUCT A STUDY OF PARK SYSTEM BOUNDARIES—WHERE DO WE DRAW THE LINE

HON. BRUCE F. VENTO

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, through a wide-ranging series of laws and administrative actions the National Park System, with its treasure of valued natural, cultural, historic, scenic, and recreational resources, has been formed. While the National Park System, as a whole, transcends political and geographical boundaries, individual park units have, in various instances, evolved that reflect those considerations to a greater degree than the resource needs. Many park units have been carved out of an ecosystem or fragmented to focus on only a few of the many natural or historical resources within an area. Numerous park boundaries follow roads, section lines, or political boundaries bisecting these resources. The administrative and ecological problems that result from such a pattern can be viewed in a multitude of park units today, with the Manassas National Battlefield being only the latest example of this regrettable occurrence.

The United States Code is replete with boundary adjustments that have been made to nearly 200 national park units. In the 100th Congress alone, over a dozen laws dealt with such adjustments. Unfortunately, many of those boundary adjustments were and continue to be made only in the face of an eminent danger or threat to the purposes for which a park unit was established. Permitting park boundary questions to go unaddressed until they result in serious confrontation or damage to the resource is illogical.

Today I am introducing legislation, along with Congressman JIM LIGHTFOOT, which attempts to move us out front of the problem in a position leading to good national park policy before crisis decisions are necessary. This legislation directs the National Park Service to undertake a comprehensive and systematic review of current boundaries of units of the National Park System. The National Park Service will be directed to prepare a detailed report within 3 years of enactment containing specific recommendations regarding boundary adjustments and other methods which may be available to protect the resources integral to such units, including related resources on adjacent lands, to preserve the viewsheds of the park unit concerned, and to improve management at such units. Such recommendations have been fragmented and inconclusive in the past.

Despite the extensive changes in use and development within and around existing park units that have occurred over the years, the National Park Service has never made an attempt to review park boundaries in any sort of systematic manner. The National Parks and Conservation Association, a nonprofit organization dedicated to national park issues recently issued a well-documented study report that revealed that 69 percent of the boundaries of primarily natural areas and 41 percent of the primarily cultural areas of the National Park System need adjustment. The constant and recurring park boundary questions brought to the attention of Congress add validity to that assessment. This initiative will review such conclusions and propose necessary action by the Congress and executive.

This legislation should not be construed as a subterfuge for expansion of the National Park System. Any modification of park boundaries, after careful analysis of the information developed by this legislation will be to assure that the purposes for which these units were designated are fulfilled. I don't anticipate recommendations for a wholesale rewrite of park boundaries developing from this legislation. Rather, we should be seeking to correct those instances where a resource is partially within or without current boundaries, complicating its protection and use on both sides of the boundary.

We need the professional data base provided by this legislation to make informed decisions on a systematic basis rather than addressing boundary questions on a piecemeal or crisis basis. I hope we can move quickly to put this commonsense process into law and I seek the support of my colleagues for this endeavor.

MAINE SOUTH HONORED BY PRESIDENT BUSH

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, I want to take the opportunity to honor the students, teachers, parents, and administrators of Maine Township High School South on this special day.

Representatives of the school, led by Principal Dr. Thomas J. Cachur, met this afternoon with President George Bush at a White House ceremony to receive the Secondary Schools of Recognition Award. This gold medal honor is presented by the President and the U.S. Department of Education to a few select schools which meet rigorous academic standards.

The Department of Education rated Maine South superior in all academic areas, particularly in the teaching of geography, which was a focus of this year's award criteria.

May I suggest that there is no more useful and rewarding profession than that of a teacher, and the excellence of the Maine South administrative and teaching staff sets a standard and example that we should all applaud.

This award is the result of the work by many other individuals, too, including engaged and caring parents and community taxpayers who have said yes to good schools.

Among those representing the school at the White House today, in addition to Dr. Cachur, are Otto M. Kohler, Jr., chairman of the school's social science department; Kaye Pierce, former chairperson of the girl's physical education and athletic department; Virginia Feurer, a college and career counselor; Karen Pflederer, an English teacher at the school; and Corrinne Duerkop, a parent representative.

MEDICARE BAN ON DOCTORS WHO ABUSE EXPERIMENTAL DRUG TESTS

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing a bill today to make doctors who abuse new drug experiments on human subjects ineligible for Medicare payments. This measure would strengthen the Federal Government's role as a force for safety and quality in medicine by linking important activities of two units of the Department of Health and Human Services, the Food and Drug Administration and the Health Care Financing Administration.

The agency that administers Medicare, the Health Care Financing Administration, HCFA, has a statutory mandate to ensure that only qualified physicians and hospitals deliver medicine to senior and disabled citizens. I believe that to ensure quality medical care, HCFA should ban physicians who break the rules when they experiment with drugs on their patients.

The Food and Drug Administration requires doctors to experiment in accordance with approved regulations and protocols. These protocols and regulations are designed and intended to safeguard the public's health and safety. They protect those individuals to whom the drugs are administered during the experimentation; and, second, they protect the general public which benefits when ineffective and harmful drugs are screened and not approved for general use, and when beneficial drugs are discovered and made available. Doctors who break the rules regarding use of drugs during experiments show callous disregard for the health of the public and the patients whom they ask to participate.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is only common sense. Why should a doctor, who breaks a fundamental ethical commitment when experimenting on a patient with a new drug, the equivalent of treating him like a guinea pig, be allowed to bill the Government for his purported "treating" of that patient? This principle goes beyond the immediate care of that patient. Violations of drug protocols and FDA drug testing regulations are grave, going to the solemn Hippocratic Oath a doctor takes before being allowed to practice. They reflect on a physician's fitness to practice. Such offenses taint what a doctor does as a doctor: his commitment and ability to truly heal. They are not confined merely to the care given a specific patient. Thus, I believe that Medicare should bar offending physicians from treating Medicare patients—who are the disabled and elderly.

DR. HERSCHEL ZACKHEIM AND MR. MICHAEL REGO

Mr. Speaker, this situation was first brought to my attention by a constituent, Mr. Michael Rego. Mr. Rego was an unwitting participant in an experiment by a physician who administered a new drug to Mr. Rego.

The physician, Dr. Herschel Zackheim, breached FDA protocols and regulations in multiple ways. I have previously referred on the floor, last October 14, to Dr. Zackheim's treatment of Rego as "Jekyll and Hyde" medicine. Dr. Zackheim, even after he had given written assurance to the FDA that he would not conduct the experiments, used the drug for 2 years in violation of FDA protocol. One of the most fundamental violations was Dr. Zackheim's failure to obtain consent from patients before experimenting on them. I think that if any of us had been experimented on without our knowledge or consent, that we would be outraged. Certainly we would wonder how another person could be so cavalier with our health. I also think we would be outraged if the Federal Government went on to pay the doctor to "treat" other patients.

In Mr. Rego's case, rather than apply the drug to a small area of the body as required by the protocol, Dr. Zackheim slathered the drug over large areas of Mr. Rego's body, possibly causing him severe nerve damage. Dr. Zackheim also failed to keep adequate and accurate case histories of patients under experimentation. Of course, this means that the effects of under or overdosage would be more difficult to track and, if needed, to treat. It also disqualifies the experiments as evidence which could establish the safety and efficacy of the drug. Consequently they are useless for any purpose but harming the patient. They might even delay the introduction of a useful and beneficial drug.

Why should Dr. Zackheim now be permitted to treat—or mistreat—Medicare patients who are generally in less of a position than Mr. Rego to knowledgeably assert their rights to respectful, quality care?

Unfortunately, the FDA which found Dr. Zackheim violated protocol cannot bar him from being eligible for Medicare reimbursements. However, Congress can.

I believe Congress should bar from the Medicare Program doctors like Dr. Zackheim, who have been made ineligible to receive investigational new drugs, or have agreed to restrictions regarding their use following FDA allegations that they have violated protocols.

I have arrived at this conclusion not merely as a result of Mr. Michael Rego's situation, but after reviewing many specific cases involving doctors who have violated FDA rules or have had their access to investigational new drugs restricted.

DR. FLOYD K. GARETZ AND NURSING HOME PATIENTS

One case involves Floyd K. Garetz, a doctor who experimented on elderly residents in nursing homes. Because his patients were confined to nursing homes it is very likely that they were on Medicare or Medicaid and Dr. Garetz' abusive treatments were paid for by the Federal Government. Incidentally, Dr. Garetz also appears to an owner of one of the nursing homes, which, in essence, provided more or less captive subjects for Dr. Garetz' experimentation.

One of these Garetz' patients, an elderly woman, after having agreed to take part in the study and having done so for a period, wished to withdraw and communicated this desire to Dr. Garetz. Rather than comply with her wishes, Dr. Garetz—secretly and with obvious disdain for the rights of this patient—crushed the experimental drug and put it in her food. As bad as this may appear it was not the only patient whom the FDA found Dr. Garetz gave drugs to after being told to stop.

Is this the type of activity we, as a Nation, should be financing? And by financing without question, accepting as a standard of practice high enough for some 32 million Medicare patients? I think not. That is what my bill attempts to say—and put teeth into.

DR. STEVEN STEEN'S EXPERIMENTAL TREATMENT OF A RETARDED INDIVIDUAL

Another example involves Steven Steen, M.D., who was practicing at Harbor General Hospital in Torrance, CA. The FDA allowed Dr. Steen to administer two drugs in an experimental clinical program. One drug had not yet been approved for general commercial sale. The other drug, Alnovin, was being tested to determine its efficacy and safety for the treatment of post-surgical pain.

The FDA found that Doctor Steen failed to maintain "adequate and accurate" case histories in the Alnovin study. Among the FDA charges was Dr. Steen's failure to record a "possible adverse reaction (screaming and hallucination) after administration * * *" If that was not enough, the FDA also wrote Dr. Steen saying "there is evidence that you may have repeatedly or deliberately submitted false information * * *" There was also evidence that Dr. Steen failed to get consent of patients before experimenting on them and, like Dr. Garetz, patients were unaware of their participation in the experiment. According to the FDA, patient signatures on Dr. Steen's purported consent forms for the Alnovin study were not those of the patients. The FDA even found that one patient was mentally retarded and therefore unable to give consent. Since he was mentally retarded, his medical care was very likely provided by Medicare or Medicaid. This means Dr. Steen may have even had the audacity to bill and have the Federal Government pay for this Jekyll- and Hyde-like treatment.

We, as legislators and as a Nation, can be proud we have put in place the Medicare System that cares for those least able to take care of their own medical needs, such as this retarded individual. We will be even more proud if we improve the program with this next step—making sure our system does not reward a person who exploits and experiments with such defenseless participants.

DR. LINKER'S UNINFORMED CANCER PATIENTS

Another example of the need for this bill is the case of Dr. Daniel Linker, M.D., who worked at the University of California Medical Center in San Francisco, a major public medical school in my State and very close to my district. The FDA found Dr. Linker violated FDA protocol involving a study of many patients with a form of acute leukemia.

The FDA determined that Dr. Linker treated patients with several drugs not called for by the protocol. It also found that Dr. Linker used drugs on patients who were ineligible for the experiment—including a patient who did not have acute leukemia. The consents of 29 patients—out of 36 sampled—were either not obtained or obtained after the patient had already been administered the experimental drug therapy. Dr. Linker also started giving patients the drugs before he received approval from the hospital's human subjects committee—for example, Dr. Linker began testing one patient more than a year before the hospital's committee gave permission to use the drug on humans.

THE PSYCHIATRIST WITH THE PATIENT RECORDS IN HIS HEAD

In another example, a group of senior citizens with Alzheimer's disease had the bad fortune to be experimented on by Dr. William K. Summers, a physician from Arcadia, CA. Dr. Summers avowed purpose was to feed a drug, THA, to patients to see if it was useful in treatment of Alzheimer's disease. Unfortunately, a number of the patients don't appear to have known what Dr. Summers was up to. Although the FDA requires that doctors have written consent from patients before they can be given experimental drugs, for numerous patients Dr. Summers appears to have only obtained undated consent forms or written consent after the patient was already on the drug.

Dr. Summers wrote an article on his study for the New England Journal of Medicine. Apparently the article caused quite a stir because when Dr. Summers claimed his results demonstrated that patients with Alzheimer's showed "significant improvement during oral THA therapy * * *" However, when the FDA audited his records it didn't see it that way.

FDA investigators compared the claims made in the article with Dr. Summers' records and found "numerous statements in your (New England Journal of Medicine) article that appear to be false." The article had stated that slowing of memory loss and other signs of Alzheimer's had been demonstrated by daily tests given each patient, which were summarized and graphed in the article. However, when questioned by the FDA, Dr. Summers admitted that "no records were in writing. * * *" Dr. Summers had the temerity to tell the FDA that he maintained all the records in his head. No premature signs of senility in Dr. Summers.

The FDA wasn't impressed. It told Dr. Summers in rather deadpan language, "It does not seem plausible that you precisely remembered multiple observations of the entire patient population without a written record * * *." Because the human guinea pigs in Dr. Summers' "study" of THA and Alzheimer's had a mean age of 70, the Federal Government was probably paying Dr. Summers for some of this treatment.

These examples of doctor-turned-experimental-zealot go on and on. Some 99 doctors have violated protocol or have been disqualified in some way from experimental FDA drug programs. The list includes doctors who have "deliberately falsified records," doctors who submitted the same altered EKG for multiple patients, and a doctor who did not report that the "Subject * * * apparently suffered an acute myocardial infraction (heart attack) immediately upon receiving the * * * drug." One doctor "reported to the sponsor that patient 25 had taken all the test medication." However, the FDA found that "Medication for patient 25 was found intact in your office."

These doctors are dangerous and the Federal Government should not reward their actions with other people's hard earned cash.

THE LACK OF SUBSTANTIAL FDA SANCTIONS

In reviewing the FDA actions to date, I am impressed not only with the outrageous acts by physicians, but with the toothless sanctions issued by the FDA. Dr. Zackheim was let off with a mild rebuke—he must work under a proctor and "treat" no more than 20 patients at a time. I mention the FDA's weak sanctions because I believe it is important and underscores the need for vigorous penalties.

The lack of substantive disciplinary measures is more remarkable in light of the powers given the FDA by Congress. For instance, the Food and Drug laws place the "burden of proof" on doctors to show they have complied with drug experiment protocols and regulations. As an example, doctors, not the FDA, must prove that they have obtained written consent before administering drugs in experimental programs. This unusual shifting of the burden of proof is a powerful tool and few agencies have it. It expresses Congress' intent that the public's health and safety should be of paramount importance.

Despite both the intent and the power to back it up, the FDA routinely appears to merely slap doctors' wrists. Penalties for baleful actions are minuscule, such as disbarring doctors for short periods, or allowing them to "agree" to not test new experimental drugs. Very common is asking the doctor agreeing "not to do it again." So much for deterrence. This means that every doctor gets a free shot at other people's bodies when it comes to drug experiments.

The FDA's benign approach extends to how it handles the results of doctors' sloppy experiments. The FDA usually leaves it to the company to see that sloppy and unethical research is not used as a basis to approve new drugs and new drug treatments. Given the recent revelations that the FDA was asleep at the switch while the drug industry falsified its generic drugs, we can guess that companies feel little complusion to pull Claus von Bulow type "research" results from their applications for new drug approvals. After all, who's going to do anything about it?

This is not to minimize the complexity and size of many of the investigations undertaken by the FDA office handling these matters. The reason for weak sanctions probably lies in a combination of regulatory topor and political philosophy at the top, and a lack of resources, uncompetitive salaries and inadequate staffing at the bottom. Those are issues that this proposed legislation does not address directly, but ones that bear looking into by this body.

In the meantime, this bill should have immediate and beneficial effect on the national health. It will cost the taxpayer nothing. But it will cost a tiny minority of doctors who practice a malignant form of medicine—if they are callous with handling people's health and experimental drugs they won't have an automatic hand in the taxpayers' pockets. It is my experience that doctors react to financial incentives—and disincentives. By threatening doctors financially, the bill prevents patient abuse and favorably affects the quality of new drug experimentation. It should make us all healthier in ways that cannot be precisely measured. It will also make the government more efficient because the painstaking and, no doubt, costly existing FDA program to ferret our misbehaving doctors—even if it isn't seriously sanctioning them—will identify, without additional cost, those doctors whom Medicare should ban.

I welcome your thoughts on this legislation.

CARGO PREFERENCE HURTS POLAND RELIEF EFFORTS

HON. DOUG BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, the exorbitant costs of United States cargo preference requirements threaten to swallow a large share of United States funds that will soon be available to purchase grain and food products for our Polish food aid relief efforts. Therefore, I am calling upon the administration and this Congress to waive cargo preference requirements on current emergency food aid to Poland.

Private estimates—including those provided by the Poles themselves—indicate that as much as 40 to 50 percent of United States funds devoted to current food aid relief efforts in Poland may be swallowed up in subsidizing the higher freight rates charged by United States shipping companies.

This scandalous situation arises from the requirement that 75 percent of all U.S. bulk food aid shipments be carried on U.S. flag vessels regardless of higher U.S. shipping costs. Grain industry sources estimate United States cost of shipping to Poland at $70 to $90 per ton, compared with non-United States rates of between $15 and $25 per ton.

United States taxpayers—and friends of Poland—should be outraged that so little of the funds provided by the United States will be used to purchase desperately needed food—and so much squandered on subsidizing a handful of greedy United States maritime shippers.

Again, the waiver of cargo preference requirements on Polish food aid is desperately needed to meet the American taxpayers' interests, and to meet the announced United States commitment to provide the maximum food relief possible to Poland within the $100 million sum announced by the Bush administration.

REMEMBERING BOB PARKER

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow a grieving community will bury one of my dearest friends, Bob Parker. Bob was highly esteemed in San Bernardino, in my congressional district, because he was a man of honor and integrity, a man who devoted his community efforts to the empowerment of the poor and of ethnic minorities. But Bob represented even more to me than the public man that our community knew. Bob was an American hero—a quiet hero of the type we do not often recognize.

Bob was born January 11, 1931 in Indiana. As a young man he proudly served his country in the U.S. Air Force from 1949 to 1953. He retained his love of flight and of airplanes throughout his life. He collected models of Air Force planes, and often threatened to "appropriate" the model of the National Aerospace Plane that sits behind my desk in Washington.

Bob married his wide, Stella, on September 11, 1956. He often talked about his 33 perfect years of marriage. Bob often spoke of his greatest accomplishments: his children Jeffrey, Philip, David, Nancy, Elaine, and Vickie. As the center of his family's life, Bob instilled in his children the same high standards for decency and integrity that he held for himself.

Bob moved with his family to San Bernardino 25 years ago. He owned several small businesses and he was a good example of the small town American entrepreneur. While Bob provided for his family, he also provided leadership for his community. He founded the West Side Action Group in the early 1970's to escort black children to school during desegregation. The group matured to become a force in the political and economic activities of the community.

Bob was involved in community service groups, such as the Muscott School PTA and the Kiwanis Club. But Bob's real interest was in local politics. He served as administrative assistant to Assemblyman Terry Goggin in the early 1980's, and has been a consultant to all of my reelection efforts since my early years in the 36th Congressional District.

Bob's special skill was telecommunications. He was happiest in a room filled with phones and young volunteers, reaching out to voters and urging them to participate in the electoral process. In his business, Bob touched many lives. He was often a surrogate father for his employees and for his friends' children. Bob always had a joke on his lips, but the joke often imparted a serious message about growing up, accepting responsibility, and participating in government. We'll never know how many young people became active citizens in our democracy because of Bob's influence in their lives.

Bob also knew that ethnic groups were being denied full participation in our society and in our government. He has long been known as the primary force behind voter registration efforts in our area, and he was chair of the Jesse Jackson campaign in the Inland Empire. Bob brought many previously disenfranchised persons into the political process.

Bob's son Jeffrey has said his father probably would want to be remembered as "Honest Bob . . . That's the way he lived." That is indeed the way Bob lived, and the legacy he leaves behind are the lives he enriched during his sojourn among us. Bob was an American hero—a quiet hero who touched the lives of the next generation and, for those he met, exemplified our most basic American values. We will miss him.

COMMUNITY SERVICE IN DROPOUT PREVENTION ACT

HON. RONALD D. COLEMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill requiring 10 percent of all funds appropriated for basic skills improvement and school dropout prevention and reentry programs be reserved for dropout programs operated by community-based organizations.

These days, the mandate of America's schools extend far beyond the brass tacks of education. Somehow our teachers combine the three R's with a tacit responsibility for the health, nutrition, and mental well-being of our children. Our schools administer everything from breakfast at daybreak to free school lunches to clinics for counseling of our kids. It's the teachers who watch for signs of abuse, involvement with drugs, or social problems in and out of school and it is the teacher who must intervene when a problem gets out of control.

The teachers and administrators I have spoken with about dropout prevention strategies have all been enthusiastic and willing to contribute what they can. The problem is time. There is a common myth that a teacher's day ends at 3 o'clock when the kids go home. In fact, there are many more hours of paper grading, test scoring, lesson preparation and the completion of progress reports. There is little time left for new programs and initiatives.

There are, however, community organizations that are willing and able to help. I have watched with satisfaction as groups in my district such as the El Paso Education Alliance have organized to work constructively with schools on the dropout issue. Community involvement—the commitment of individuals to solving social problems—is the only answer for the host of social ills we as a nation must face. It is not enough for the public to sit passively by waiting for the Government to solve problems of this nature and it is foolish when the Government thinks it can. It will take a bigger effort, a combination of Government and community support to make things happen.

As a result, I am introducing the "Community Service in Dropout Prevention Act." The idea is to provide community organizations who have the time, the people, and the commitment to assist with or develop dropout prevention programs an opportunity for financial assistance.

I am not proposing that we take money away from schools and give it to community groups—I have already introduced legislation creating a new program of matching grants to States for the schools and mandating a moderate increase in existing dropout prevention legislation. I also do not intend to create a cash account for private firms wishing to provide advice to community organizations. My purpose is to direct a moderate amount of assistance toward community groups who are providing concrete assistance in stopping the loss of America's lifeblood, our future—our children's decision to drop out.

Over 4.2 million children dropped out of school last year. Without the minimal requirement of a high school education these kids are destined for a permanent economic underclass. Our democratic ideals mean little to those who have no hope for the future. We must do everything we can to ensure that we, as a caring society, join together to make that hope a reality.

KANSAN ENDS DISTINGUISHED NAVAL CAREER

HON. JAN MEYERS

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mrs. MEYERS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute to a resident of my district who has served a distinguished naval career. This Saturday, Naval Reserve Rear Adm. D.O. Smart of Overland Park, KS, will relinquish command of the 17,000-person Reserve Naval Construction Force.

Rear Admiral Smart, who has enjoyed a naval career spanning 35 years, will be honored here in Washington at the Navy Memorial. This ceremony will be a fitting tribute to a man who has proudly served his country.

Rear Admiral Smart started his naval career in 1955 upon commissioning as an ensign. After 4 years of active duty, he joined the Naval Reserve. In 1987, he became the commander of the Reserve Naval Construction Force.

While serving in his post, Rear Admiral Smart was responsible for seventeen 650-man battalions located throughout the United States. In time of a national emergency, the reserve construction forces would constitute almost 70 percent of the Navy's total construction capability.

The construction forces, which are known as the "Seabees" among Navy personnel, are the Navy's combat engineers. Their nickname is derived from the initials "CB" for construction battalion. The Seabees are renowned for their contruction work during World War II in the South Pacific.

In addition to his distinguished naval career, Rear Admiral Smart was, until recently, the vice president of Award Flooring in Lenexa, KS. He is a registered professional engineer in Missouri.

Upon retirement as Commander of the Reserve Naval Construction Force, Rear Admiral Smart will continue to reside in Overland Park, KS.

Mr. Speaker, although I will not be able to attend Rear Admiral Smart's retirement ceremony this Saturday at the Navy Memorial, I want to take this opportunity to acknowledge his dedicated service, and that of his wife, Beverly, and to express the gratitude of his fellow Kansans and countrymen for those 35 years of abiding commitment.

And now, may he enjoy his change of pace with this family and friends, and all the abundant blessings he so richly deserves.

50TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE HAMMOND HARWOOD HOUSE

HON. C. THOMAS McMILLEN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. McMILLEN of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to acknowledge a national historic landmark, the Hammond Harwood House, a museum that has preserved the heritage of 18th century Annapolis for the past 50 years. I also wish to commend the efforts of the Hammond Harwood Association, a volunteer group, that has taken it upon themselves to purchase and restore this historical site.

In 1774 Maphius Hammond commissioned the renowned English architect William Buckley to design this home. The house remained within the Hammond family until the death of the last heir in 1926, when St. John's College became the owner. The house remained relatively empty until 1938 when the Hammond Harwood Association was created with the goal of restorating and purchasing the historic home. In 1940, through its dedication, it raised enough funds so that it was able to purchase the Hammond Harwood House from St. John's College.

Since 1940 the Hammond Harwood Association has been committed to restoring this golden age monument as closely as possible to its original 18th century atmosphere. The architecture retains its original carved woodwork, without any modern alterations, and the house also retains contents original to the era. Notably, the works of local craftsman John Shaw, and Charles Willson Peale, an 18th century Annapolitan artist, are displayed. In the drawing room, a former colonial music program is offered which allows opportunities for the public to learn about music of the time period and local musicians to perform music of the 18th century. This exact preservation allows the community to fully experience this era.

It is with great pride that I extend my sincerest congratulations to the Hammond Harwood House and the Hammond Harwood Association for the 50 years of historic community service. I know that my colleagues will be pleased to join me in offering best wishes for the continued preservation and success of this prestigious landmark.

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO COMMUNITY REHABILITATION INDUSTRIES OF LONG BEACH AND TEXACO INC.

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in order to bring to the attention of the House an event taking place in Long Beach, CA, which will illustrate for those who are not aware the excellent ties that exist between industry and education,and between industry and community programs. On October 7, 1989, the Community Rehabilitation Industries [CRI] of Long Beach will honor Texaco Inc. for their commitment to people with disabilities. CRI is a not-for-profit agency providing vocational training and job placement to people with disabilities. Since opening their doors in 1956, CRI has provided services to thousands of individuals with disabilities.

Texaco has been committed to CRI's programs over the past 3 years and this year they became the title sponsor of the November 12, Texaco Long Beach Shoreline Half Marathon. According to Chuck Walz, plant manager of Texaco Refining and Marketing, Inc. Los Angeles plant stated, "We are proud to support CRI and their efforts for persons with disabilities and we are equally excited about being involved with the race. It was realizing what a contribution CRI makes to the community combined with the employees enthusiasm for the race that convinces Texaco to make such a heavy commitment."

Not only has Texaco made a huge financial commitment to CRO, but their employees have become extremely involved as volunteers. Two Texaco employees are members of CRI's board of directors; in addition, many employees volunteer for the half marathon or run in the actual race.

Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in entering these comments into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Texaco Inc. is to be commended at the same time that we commend the board of directors, executive director Judith Pierson, the staff and personnel of Community Rehabilitation Industries. It is an honor to have this community oriented facility in my district.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS REFORM, RECOVERY, AND ENFORCEMENT ACT OF 1989 (FIRREA)

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, In an effort to clarify my amendment that is contained in the FIRREA Act of 1989, I submit the following explanation.

New section 5(d)(3) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act, adopted in FIRREA (pp. 19–21 of the August 4 Conference Report), contains an "optional conversion" procedure under which a bank holding company may, with Federal Reserve Board approval, merge a thrift it owns into a bank it owns. This is commonly referred to as the "Oakar Amendment". The Board may approve the merger only if five conditions are met.

One of the requirements of my amendment is that the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System may not approve an application unless the Board determines that, for transactions occurring during the first year after enactment of FIRREA, the savings association had tangible capital of less than 4 percent "during the preceding quarter". The phrase "during the preceding quarter" refers, of course, to the quarter preceding the acquisition of the savings association by the bank holding company. A thrift that has less than 4 percent capital during the quarter preceding acquisition by a bank holding company, but that subsequently has been capitalized to higher levels, would therefore meet this requirement in my amendment. Any contrary result would unfairly penalize those institutions whose capital positions had been improved after acquisition, and indeed would encourage acquirors not to improve the thrift's tangible capital position. That result would be contrary to the fundamental thrust of the legislation, which I strongly supported, toward higher capital requirements.

HURRICANE HUGO DISASTER RELIEF ACT

HON. RICHARD T. SCHULZE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Hurricane Hugo Disaster Relief Act of 1989.

My legislation would require the Government Development Bank for Puerto Rico—which manages section 936 funds allocated by the U.S. Government—to make available up to $1 billion in the form of low-interest loans to provide disaster relief in the Caribbean Basin region. This includes Caribbean Basin beneficiary countries or U.S. territorial possessions which are declared disaster areas due to damages caused by natural disasters—Hurricane Hugo being the most recent case in point.

Importantly, this measure will not undermine section 936's role in fueling infrastructural development in the region. Indeed, by ensuring that a portion of the 936 reserve funds are used for disaster relief, we actually promote the infrastructural development and redevelopment so essential to picking up the pieces left behind by this natural disaster.

REPEAL OF SECTION 89

HON. BEN JONES

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. JONES of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to salute the House for voting overwhelmingly to repeal section 89. I was an early supporter of repeal of section 89, and despite the Wall Street Journal's claims to the contrary, I have never wavered in my support for repeal.

Section 89 was designed to encourage employers to give rank-and-file workers the same benefits as top executives, but the regulations required companies to do complicated tests of their benefits plans to determine whether they discriminated. Hundreds of small businesses in the Fourth District complained to me that the provisions were overly complicated, too costly, and would force them to stop offering health plans altogether. Repeal was clearly needed.

I am pleased the House acted in the best interest of small business by supporting repeal, and I hope my colleagues in the Senate will support the House and vote the repeal.

WESTERN NEW YORK CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

HON. BILL PAXON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. PAXON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in honor of the 30th Annual "Captive Nations Week" held in the city of Buffalo and the county of Erie in New York from July 17 to July 22, 1989.

Thirty years ago, in 1959, the U.S. Congress passed unanimously Public Law 86–90 which not only called for a halt to further Communist expansionism, but also clearly acknowleged the just and rightful claims to independence of all nations that fell into the Soviet Communist orbit.

Since the end of World War II, when many nations lost their independence and were submerged into the Soviet bloc, the citizens of those nations have looked to the United States as the citadel of freedom.

Recent events in Poland and Hungary, upheavels in the Baltic States and the Ukraine, as well as the bloodbath in China, once again prove that nations refuse to accept the yoke of enslavement and have demonstrated clearly the bankruptcy and illegitimacy of Communist rule.

The Captive Nations Week Law is expressly designed to encourage and support the rightful aspirations of the enslaved nations in their just struggle to regain their national freedom and independence.

I congratulate Buffalo Mayor Jimmy Griffin and Erie County Executive Dennis Gorski for proclaiming Captive Nations Week.

I would also like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Buffalo Chapter of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America, and its chairman, Dasha Procyk. For the past 30 years, the Ukranian Congress has spearheaded the work of the Western New York Captive Nations Committee.

I am pround, Mr. Speaker, to honor today in the House of Representatives the 30th Annual Captive Nations Week in western New York.

SOUTH CAROLINA DISASTER

HON. ARTHUR RAVENEL, JR.

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. RAVENEL. Mr. Speaker, not since the tragic war between the States has South Carolina suffered a disaster even approaching the destruction wrought in just hours by the hurricane called Hugo. Winds, sometimes approaching 200 miles an hour, rain horizontally driven like missiles, tidal waves exceeding 20 feet at the time of high tide, and an apparent line of vicious tornadoes have all left our dear city of Charleston and a vast area of South Carolina in a condition of almost unbelievable destruction.

Only the superb actions by local, State, and Federal officials, collectively preparing our people to survive this killer hurricane, minimized the loss of life. These preparations included an order of mandatory evacuation of the barrier islands and low areas. Resolutely, South Carolinians, further battered by driven rains, have begun the task of renewal, cheered by the massive assistance flowing to us from a compassionate Federal Government.

I applaud the inclusion in this continuing resolution of $1.1 billion by Senators THURMOND and HOLLINGS and am proud that this House has approved the appropriation by a unanimous vote.

DEVELOPMENTS IN THE NICARAGUAN ELECTORAL PROCESS

HON. GEO. W. CROCKETT, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Speaker, this is another in a series of statements about the Nicaraguan electoral process, in which I am sharing with my colleagues objective information about that process in order to help us judge its legitimacy.

In response to a request by the Nicaraguan Government, the Government of Venezuela sent a mission to Nicaragua in March, comprised of Venezuela's Supreme Electoral Council and representatives of Venezuela's three main political parties, for the purpose of studying electoral conditions in Nicaragua, making recommendations for improvements, and identifying ways in which Venezuelan aid could be helpful.

The Venezuelan study mission produced a report in April, the conclusions and recommendations of which I wish to include in the RECORD. I would call my colleagues' attention to the statement in the report that "There is currently a climate of political opening in Nicaragua that makes it possible to initiate an electoral process and to seek agreements to enable such a process to be conducted under satisfactory conditions."

Last month the Center for International Policy distributed a report on Nicaragua's electoral reforms, which included a chart showing which of the Venezuelan recommendations have been implemented by Nicaragua. I include this chart following the excerpt from the Venezuelan report.

The material referred to follows:

CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

In view of the situation described throughout this report, it is possible to draw the following conclusions:

(A) There is currently a climate of political opening in Nicaragua that makes it possible to initiate an electoral process and to seek agreements to enable such a process to be conducted under satisfactory conditions.

Fundamental factors in the success of this process have been the peace agreements promoted by the Central American Presidents, the end of military operations in Nicaraguan territory, and the development of democratic positions within Nicaragua, together with the imperative need of the Sandinista Government to promote a strategy of political and economic coordination that will make national recovery possible.

In particular, the El Salvador agreement signed last February has made it possible to specify measures and approaches to facilitate the functioning of a party system and the holding of elections within an appropriate legal and political context in the country.

(B) It is possible to specify the set of conditions that are considered fundamental for the execution of the process and which involve the following aspects: Balanced composition of the electoral bodies; creation of a reliable voter registration list; equitable access to the media; modification of the rules governing political parties; and progress of the electoral campaign.

These conditions, which are discussed at length in the body of the report, constitute the basis for the best possible management of the electoral process. The Mission believes it is perfectly reasonable to think that these conditions can be achieved in the current political climate of Nicaragua.

Naturally, many of them require significant reforms of the Electoral Law and the media law, which must be undertaken by the competent bodies.

Other conditions are only a matter of specific political compromises and they can all form the basis for a comprehensive political agreement between the government and the opposition that can be achieved over the short term.

(C) It is highly advisable to maintain international support and cooperation to make it possible to attain the above mentioned conditions and to help the electoral process proceed satisfactorily.

The role of countries like Venezuela and Costa Rica, for example, is of particualr importance, given the good relations these countries have with Nicaragua.

In the case of Venezuela, it is necessary to develop a program of actions so that support and cooperation can produce concrete measures to be undertaken from now until the time the elections are held.

The program should be structured to cover the following aspects: Electoral technical assistance to Nicaragua; logistical support; participation as observers of the electoral process; and involvement in the international arena.

In each of these areas, the actions being proposed are indicated below:

1. Electoral technical assistance—

(a) provide any support Nicaragua considers necessary to: Provide methodical arrangement of the reforms of laws and electoral regulations; create a voter registration list; establish the voting, vote counting, and calculation systems; use mechanized elements in the processs; and issue regulations on specific matters related to the electoral campaign.

(b) Organize a series of seminars for government employees, members of the opposition, and electoral officials, in which the Venezuelan electoral experience will be described in order to illustrate the diversity of issues involved in the process and possible solutions.

This series could begin with first seminar to be led by Dr. Carlos Delgado Chapellin, President of the Venezuelan CSE.

(c) Bring officials from the Nicaraguan CSE to the Venezuelan CSE for visits and training.

2. Logistical support—

(a) Determine in detail the logistical support that Venezuela can provide in terms of: Materials; equipment; and services. Schedule the sending of the respective supplies.

(b) Support any démarches undertaken in the international arena to create a comprehensive aid package, establishing some coordination mechanism to ensure maximum efficiency in the allocation of resources.

3. Participation as observers—

(a) In order to track the process continuously from the beginning, it seems advisable to create a group of observers (three or four people) assigned to the Embassy of Venzuela in Nicaragua.

This group must maintain relations and contacts with the government and the opposition to comply with the objective of acting as honest witnesses of the situation as it develops.

In addition, the group must act as a center to coordinate the technical assistance and logistical support provided to Nicaragua.

(b) As the date of the election approaches, the number of observers should be increased to perhaps some 25 or 30 people so they can cover the various aspects of "the process and be present in the various geographical areas.

In general, it is advisable that these observers be chosen with a pluralistic representation from various political currents.

THE 30TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE SOUTH COAST MEDICAL CENTER

HON. RON PACKARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 28, 1989

Mr. PACKARD. Mr. Speaker, this month marks a very important anniversary in the distinguished history of the South Coast Medical Center—a very special hospital that serves the residents of the 43d Congressional District.

It was 30 years ago this September that South Coast began its dedication to providing quality health care to the community and that dedication has manifested itself on repeated occasions throughout the past three decades.

Several special events have been held to celebrate the 30th anniversary of the hospital and at each one the community has responded with continued strong support and enthusiasm for this quality institution.

South Coast Medical Center is a 268-bed, not-for-profit general acute care hospital that provides patient services ranging from critical care, same-day surgery, maternity services, and a 24-hour emergency room. In addition, the hospital has been a leader in chemical dependency treatment, as well as mental health services.

The hospital's Women's Pavilion and Resource Center, an information and referral source for women of all ages on health care issues, is another fine example of how this facility meets the needs of the communities it serves.

To the hospital president, T. Michael Murray, the board of directors and all the staff at South Coast Medical Center, I would like to offer my personal congratulations on 30 years of excellent health care services.

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

PRAYER

The Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

And I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing: And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed.—Genesis 12:2, 3.

 * * I have loved thee with an everlasting love: therefore with lovingkindness have I drawn thee.*—Jeremiah 31:3.

God of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, on this eve of Rosh Hashanah, first of the Jewish high holy days, as their new year begins, we recall with gladness and gratitude Your remarkable promise to Abraham and the assurance of Your everlasting love through Jeremiah. Thank Thee for the promise of universal blessing through Your Old Testament people, for their unprecedented perseverance despite repeated efforts throughout history to destroy them. Let Thy blessing rest upon them through these days of penitence and spiritual renewal in anticipation of Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement. Be glorified in them and in all who have faith in Thee, O Lord our God. Amen.
